PROCEEDINGS AND DEBATES OF THE SEVENTIETH CONGRESS SECOND SESSION

SENATE

SATURDAY, January 5, 1929

The Chaplain, Rev. ZeBarney T. Phillips, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O God, whose Spirit mingles with our own as sunshine in the air, help us in spirit and in truth to worship only Thee.

Forgive in us whatever is amiss, that in the duties of this day we may find ourselves free from the dusty cares of life, eager to press with winged feet through paths of high endeavor to the goal set by Thy love. Lead us out of darkness into dawn, out of the less to the large, and use us for Thine own purposes, just as Thou wilt and when and where. Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

NAMING A PRESIDING OFFICER

The Chief Clerk read the following communication:

UNITED STATES SENATE,
PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE,
Washington, D. C., January 5, 1929.

To the Senate:

Being temporarily absent from the Senate, I appoint Hon. CHARLES L. MCNARY, a Senator from the State of Oregon, to perform the duties of the Chair this legislative day.

GEORGE H. MOSES,
President Pro Tempore.

Mr. MCNARY took the chair as Presiding Officer and directed that the Journal be read.

THE JOURNAL

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of the legislative day of Thursday last when, on request of Mr. CURTIS, and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

SETTLEMENT OF DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA CLAIMS

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 3581) authorizing the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to settle claims and suits against the District of Columbia.

Mr. CAPPER. I move that the Senate disagree to the amendments made by the House and request a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to, and the Presiding Officer appointed Mr. CAPPER, Mr. BLAINE, and Mr. KING conferees on the part of the Senate.

PETITIONS

Mr. BURTON presented petitions and papers in the nature of petitions of members of Muskingum College, of New Concord; members of the Young Woman's Christian Association of Springfield; members of the Board of Federation of Women's Clubs, of Zanesville; students of the Lincoln High School, of Canton; members of the Monthly Meeting of Friends, of Salem; members of the Men's Bible Class of the Van Buren St. Methodist Episcopal Church, of Dayton; students of Hiram College, of Hiram, and sundry citizens, all in the State of Ohio, praying for the prompt ratification of the so-called Kellogg peace pact for the renunciation of war, without qualification or reservation, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. GREENE presented a petition of sundry citizens of Bennington, Vt., praying for the prompt ratification of the so-called Kellogg multilateral treaty for the renunciation of war, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. EDGE presented a communication from W. F. Bigelow, editor of Good Housekeeping, favoring the prompt ratification of the so-called Kellogg peace pact, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

GOOD HOUSEKEEPING,
New York, N. Y., January 2, 1929.

Senator WALTER E. EDGE,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR EDGE: At the New Year's Eve meeting of the Monday Club, an organization composed of leading citizens of Roselle-Roselle Park, N. J., a resolution indorsing the Kellogg pact and praying for its speedy ratification by the Senate was adopted, and I was instructed to acquaint you and Senator EDWARDS with our action. We realize that our voice is but a small one, but are confident that there are enough small voices throughout the Nation to constitute a mighty chorus. We believe that the people want America put on record as desiring peace.

Sincerely yours,

W. F. BIGELOW.

SIMPLIFICATION OF NATURALIZATION PROCESS

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I present a communication in the nature of a petition from the Chamber of Commerce of Quincy, Mass., which I ask to have printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Immigration. It requests the passage of Federal legislation, with which I am in accord, to simplify and reduce the expenses of the naturalization process.

There being no objection, the communication was referred to the Committee on Immigration and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

QUINCY CHAMBER OF COMMERCE,
Quincy, Mass., January 4, 1929.

Senator DAVID I. WALSH,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR WALSH: At a meeting of the board of directors of the Quincy Chamber of Commerce, held on December 6, 1928, it was voted to petition Federal legislators to simplify and reduce the expenses of the naturalization process.

The Quincy Chamber of Commerce hopes to have the aid of the legislators in reducing the number of times which an alien must bring witnesses to State court tribunals during the naturalization. Under the present system an applicant for United States citizenship must bring two witnesses before superior court officials on three separate occasions, whereas if the alien uses the Federal court in Boston as the machine of naturalization he is required to produce his witnesses on but two occasions.

The differences in the workings of the State and Federal courts are explained in a letter written to the chamber of commerce by Robert B. Worthington, superior court clerk, which says:

"The Federal Constitution provides that 'the Congress shall have power * * * to establish a uniform rule of naturalization,' and it also provides that 'this Constitution and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof * * * shall be the supreme law of the land and the judges in every State shall be bound thereby, anything in the Constitution or laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding.' In matters of naturalization the United States court and the Massachusetts court exercise concurrent jurisdiction under the Federal law.

"Naturalization of aliens is now effected under an act of Congress passed June 29, 1906, entitled 'An act to provide for a uniform rule for the naturalization of aliens throughout the United States and establishing the Bureau of Naturalization, a title which apparently specifically recognizes the constitutional authority given the Congress to establish a uniform rule of naturalization.' Under this act of 1906, aliens residing in Massachusetts may be naturalized either in the district court of the United States or in the Massachusetts Superior Court. An alien can be admitted only in accordance with the specific provisions of this act. Every petition for naturalization must, when filed, be verified by affidavits of two credible witnesses. All hearings on petitions for naturalization can be had only on stated days fixed by the court and not until at least 90 days have elapsed after the date of the filing of petition.

"Under an act of Congress passed June 8, 1926, provision was made whereby in the United States District Court (but not in State courts) an officer of the Bureau of Naturalization, designated by the judge, is authorized to make a report to the court as to the sufficiency of the witnesses to petitions, and if the examiner's report is approved by the judge the witnesses are not required to appear on any other occasion.

"Under the 1926 amendment two witnesses to each petition in the superior court, often on three separate occasions and invariably on two separate occasions, must personally appear before the court or before representatives of the Government.

"First. At the time of filing the petition the petitioner and his witnesses are required to be present and affix their signatures to the petition and make oath to their statements before the clerk.

"Second. At some time before the final hearing of the petition the witnesses are required to be examined by the representative of the Bureau of Naturalization.

"Third. On the date of the final hearing the witness must appear in court and be examined in open court in the presence of the court.

"On petitions filed in the Federal court only one appearance of witnesses may be required.

"It would seem that a question might properly be raised as to the constitutionality of the act of 1926, which does not appear 'to provide a uniform rule of naturalization.' If this act could be amended by inserting therein words which would extend the application of the provisions of the act to include all courts authorized to exercise naturalization jurisdiction the principle of uniformity in the law under the Constitution would be observed.

"The next stated day for hearing petitions for naturalization at Quincy will be on Monday, February 25, 1929. Petitions for naturalization were received at Quincy on Thursday, November 22, and Friday, November 23, 1928. Through the cooperation of the office of the district director of naturalization at Boston, who is the representative of the Bureau of Naturalization in the Massachusetts district of the Federal court, examiners were present when the petitions were received. By this arrangement it will not be necessary for the witnesses to appear again until the date of the final hearing."

It is the hope of starting a movement which may ultimately result in the amending of this act that animates the Quincy Chamber of Commerce in appealing to Senators and Representative from this district in Washington.

Respectfully yours,

G. A. WARDWELL, Secretary.

DALLINGER AMENDMENT TO CRUISER BILL

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I have recently been in communication with the Navy Department with respect to the effect of the Dallinger amendment as passed by the House of Representatives to the bill H. R. 11526—cruiser bill, so-called—and at my request the Navy Department have prepared a statement as to the effect of the Dallinger amendment as they interpret it; also the effect of the Dallinger amendment as amended by the Senate Committee on Naval Affairs and reported to the Senate in the bill H. R. 11526—a compromise agreed to by the Naval Affairs Committee—and also the effect of the bill H. R. 11526 without either the Dallinger amendment or the amendment made to the Dallinger amendment by the Senate Committee on Naval Affairs.

I request that this statement be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD to be considered in connection with the debate upon the cruiser bill, H. R. 11526.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

H. R. 11526—DALLINGER AMENDMENT

EFFECT OF DALLINGER AMENDMENT AS PASSED BY THE HOUSE

As passed by the House, the Dallinger amendment to the bill H. R. 11526 provided as follows:

"And provided further, That the first and each succeeding alternate cruiser upon which work is undertaken, together with the main engines, armor, and armament for such light cruisers, the construction and manufacture of which is authorized by this act, shall be constructed or manufactured in the Government navy yards, naval gun factories, naval ordnance plants, or arsenals of the United States."

The effect of this amendment as it passed the House would be to increase the cost of construction of the cruisers materially. It would be impossible for the Government to manufacture all the equipment that goes into the construction of cruisers except at an inordinate expense. The manufacture of certain material and equipment by the Government would involve infringement of patents. Certain fire-control equipment, electrical equipment, gun forgings, etc., can not be manufactured in navy yards, or other Government industrial plants, not only because of lack of equipment to do that class of work but because of the lack of buildings, trained men, organization, and experience. If the protective plating of the cruisers should be construed as armor to be built in Government yards, it would require opening the armor plant at Charleston, W. Va., at considerable expense.

All the navy yards are not equipped to build cruisers. It will require additional expenditures to place some of the navy yards in a position to build the eight cruisers, not only from a material standpoint, such as rebuilding ways, purchasing new equipment, but also from the point of view of organization and the dearth of skilled mechanics and necessary technical men in the vicinity of some of the navy yards.

EFFECT OF THE DALLINGER AMENDMENT AS AMENDED BY THE SENATE

The Dallinger amendment as amended by the Senate in the bill H. R. 11526 provides as follows:

"And provided further, That the first and each succeeding alternate cruiser upon which work is undertaken, together with the main engines, armor, and armament for such light cruisers, the construction and manufacture of which is authorized by this act, shall be constructed or manufactured in the Government navy yards, naval gun factories, naval ordnance plants, or arsenals of the United States, except such material or parts thereof as the Secretary of the Navy may find procurable by contract or purchase at an appreciable saving in cost to the Government."

The effect of the Senate amendment is to make it possible for the Government navy yards to build the eight cruisers required to be built thereat. With the Senate amendment the Secretary of the Navy has some discretionary powers in the procurement of materials and/or parts of cruisers by contract or purchase when an appreciable saving in cost to the Government would thereby result.

Even with the modified language of the Senate it will be necessary to expend considerable sums in preparing some of the navy yards for the construction of these cruisers.

EFFECT OF BILL H. R. 11526 WITHOUT DALLINGER AMENDMENT

If the bill H. R. 11526 is passed without the Dallinger amendment, the Navy Department would be governed by the general law governing the awards of contracts. If the language usually contained in the naval appropriation acts is continued, the Government would be fully protected.

For example, the naval appropriation act of May 21, 1928, provides as follows:

"* * * and that no part of the moneys herein appropriated for the Naval Establishment or herein made available therefor shall be used or expended under contracts hereafter made for the repair, purchase, or acquirement, by or from any private contractor, of any naval vessel, machinery, article or articles that at the time of the proposed repair, purchase, or acquirement can be repaired, manufactured, or produced in each or any of the Government navy yards or arsenals of the United States, when time and facilities permit, and when, in the judgment of the Secretary of the Navy, such repair, purchase, acquirement, or production would not involve an appreciable increase in cost to the Government."

The effect of the bill H. R. 11526 without the Dallinger amendment woud be to give the Secretary of the Navy a wider discretion in the building of the cruisers. He would be governed by the foregoing language contained in the annual appropriation acts and would be required to construct the cruisers in Government navy yards in preference to private shipyards, unless an appreciable increase in cost would result.

By giving the Secretary of the Navy a wider discretion more competition will result between the navy yards and the private shipyards. A material saving in the cost of the construction of these cruisers will result and in time in which they can be completed.

OLD-AGE PENSION SYSTEMS

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, the Committee on Education and Labor have been holding hearings with respect to the unemployment problem. Those hearings have been held under a Senate resolution submitted by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE]. One of the problems with which the committee have been called upon to deal in connection with this investigation is that relating to the increasing tendency in industrial and commercial life to discharge employees on reaching middle life or early old age, and the extent to which this movement in industrial and commercial life has gone in urging the necessity of age pension systems.

The State of Wisconsin has two pension acts, one of them known as the "mothers' pension act" and the other known as the "old age pension act." The latter act has been in operation over three years, but only 6 counties out of 72 have adopted it. I have a statement of the operation of the old age pension law in Wisconsin from the county judge of La Crosse, Wis., who has administered the law, and I request that the statement be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Education and Labor, as follows:

To Senator WALSH:

The following constitutes a synopsis of our pension-aid systems in Wisconsin:

We have two pension acts, one is for the aid of dependent children in the home and known as the mothers' pension act. This is a State law making it compulsory for the counties to provide for it. One-third of the cost is borne by the State and two-thirds by the county. It provides for a pension to mothers who have one or more children under 16 years of age and who are dependent either on account of death, incapacity, or desertion of the father, and in case of the death of both father and mother a pension can be given to a grandparent or guardian who may have the custody and care of the children.

The maximum pension that can be given for this purpose is not to exceed $15 for the first child and $10 each for the other children per month. This pension aid is administered by the county judge or juvenile judge in each county, and he appoints to assist him in the matter of management a child-welfare board consisting of three members, who serve without pay and receive nothing except actual expenses. Other social workers, such as probation officers, are called upon for assistance. In this county, La Crosse County, our mothers' pension system is primarily in charge of our probation officer, who makes a budget of each family's income and necessities. Investigations are made about every three months, and each mother or guardian also under the mothers' pension system must make a written report each month of their income and expenditures, and unless this is done their monthly check is not sent out.

The fact is that the Legislature of Wisconsin has not lived up to the provision of the law which requires two-thirds of the cost to be paid by the State and one-third by the counties. The counties have to pay practically all.

This system of mothers' pension is very satisfactory, and I am sure that there would be little sentiment for its repeal. Of course, abuses will creep in, but that depends largely upon the supervision. Of course, if a county judge is given supervision of granting mothers' pensions and has not sufficient help to have investigations made, naturally some people will be getting assistance who should not have it.

Our other system of pensions in this State is the old-age pension. Perhaps it is this system you are more concerned about. I am inclosing herewith a printed circular which gives a synopsis of our old age pension act. This is also a State act, but it is optional with the counties to go under it or not. While the law has been in operation over three years, only 6 counties out of 72 have adopted it. La Crosse County is one of those counties. Only one county, I believe, has discarded it after adopting it. It is within the power of the county board to adopt the system and then abandon it later if it sees fit. Under this law one-third of the cost is also paid by the State and two-thirds by the county. A county, however, can charge the tax back to the taxing unit in which the pensioner resides. The State under the old-age pension system has caused sufficient appropriations to be made to meet its share.

The pension is really designated to take care of indigent people who are over 70 years of age and, as the law provides, whose income does not exceed $1 a day. The pension itself can not exceed $30 a month, and in many instances only half of that amount is given. In fact, the average in this county of our old-age pension was slightly in advance of $17 a month last year. You can readily see that the recipients of this pension are people who are practically down and out financially and who have no earning power to speak of. Many of them would have to go to the county poorhouse, which is maintained by the counties in this State, if they did not receive a pension. A person can, however, be eligible to pension who has property up to $3,000. The obvious reason for this is that oftentimes an old couple may own their home but have no income to live upon. If there are children, and especially sons, we make it a point to have them do something if possible to aid their father or mother. Under our law a son is liable for his parents' support, but as a matter of practice actions to enforce a son or sons to support their aged parents are very rare. However, the initiation of the old-age pension has emphasized the responsibility, and in many cases where an application is made, instead of granting it we take steps to have the old people supported by sons and daughters.

The same supervision applies to old-age pensions as it does to mothers' pension, but the investigation is made principally at the time the pension is granted. This initial investigation is the principal thing, because conditions do not change much with the applicant for old-age pension, while there may be a decided change, of course, with the young mother, for instance, who receives a mother's pension. Provision is made in the old-age pension act for a lien upon the real estate, if any, after the death of the pensioner. This is a very satisfactory provision, and while we have not collected any great amount that way the children who are responsible for the support of parents will oftentimes do more when they know that a lien would be enforced against the home of their parents in case of their death.

In my observation, the administration of old-age pension in this county has been highly successful. While it does not give a large amount to the old people, yet it comes to them monthly in the form of a check, and they are much more independent than they would be if the relief came in another way.

We have one provision of our law which provides full citizenship. This has worked to disadvantage, because we have many old people of foreign birth who did not take out their second papers. They were allowed to vote formerly by having their first papers, and they did not go to the trouble of taking their final papers. Inasmuch as our law provides full citizenship for 15 years, the case of a foreigner without second papers, although he may have been a resident of the State and county for 50 years, places him in a position where he is forever barred, because to wait 15 years after he applies practically bars him.

As I view it, the proper administration of the old-age pension ought to practically abolish the county almshouse, although it would still be necessary for counties to maintain some institution in the nature of a county hospital for the care and nursing of these indigents who are not able to care for themselves in their own homes.

A system similar to our mothers' pension is in operation in several States. As to the old-age pension, I believe some other States have adopted old age pension acts, but I am not familiar with their provisions.

WISCONSIN'S OLD-AGE PENSION SYSTEM—WHAT TO KNOW IN APPLYING FOR ASSISTANCE UNDER THE WISCONSIN OLD AGE PENSION LAW

(Chapter 121, laws 1925)

I. Under the provisions of chapter 121, laws 1925, any county is authorized by a two-thirds vote of the members elected to its county board to establish a system of old-age pensions, and after operating under such system for one year or more may abandon such system.

2. Both blanks should be properly filled out, giving all the information required to the best of their knowledge, which information shall be sworn to or affirmed by the applicant and returned to the county judge. (The attention of applicants is called to the fact that no legal advice is necessary in making out the application. If they are unable to write they may ask some one else to do it for them. There is no necessity for the payment of a lawyer's fee in filling out an application for old-age pension.)

3. Upon receipt of application the county judge shall make or cause such investigations to be made as he may deem necessary, and shall decide finally upon the application and the amount of pension to be granted.

4. The applicant will be notified of the approval or disapproval of his or her application.

VI. Miscellaneous provisions:

1. During the continuance of the pension no pensioner shall receive any other relief from the State or from any political subdivision thereof except for medical and surgical assistance.

2. All pensions shall be exempt from any tax levied by the State or by any subdivision thereof and exempt from levy and sale, garnishment, attachment, or any other process whatsoever.

MUSCLE SHOALS

Mr. McKELLAR introduced a bill (S. 5218) authorizing the Secretary of War to build transmission lines and dispose of power generated at Muscle Shoals, which was read twice by its title.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I desire to make a brief explanation of the bill which I have just introduced. It is a bill authorizing the Secretary of War to operate Muscle Shoals as a temporary proposition. I find that the water power is going to waste absolutely at Muscle Shoals. There is but one purchaser of the power, namely, the Alabama Power Co. The officer in charge of leasing the power has stated that the Alabama Power Co. has recently completed two other hydroelectric plants, and that it does not need the power at this time, and is only buying a very small proportion of the power generated at Muscle Shoals.

It will be remembered that the Senate and the House passed a bill at the last session providing for the sale of power under certain circumstances, and providing further that the board, which was given authority over the power there, should lease it to States and municipalities within transmission distance if it were possible to do so. It also authorized the board to build transmission lines within reasonable bounds so that it might have more than one bidder for the current that was generated. It provided that if States or counties or municipalities did not want the power, then the board should lease it to private individuals for limited periods of not more than 10 years.

I have taken those provisions of the act which we passed at the first session of this Congress, there being only four sections, and incorporated them in the bill which I have just introduced, which provides for the use of the power by the Government. I think that we ought by all means to reenact that portion of the other bill, the President having vetoed the bill for other reasons. All of the objectionable features are omitted from the bill which I have just introduced. I have put into the bill simply the provisions of the other bill which was vetoed concerning the temporary disposition of surplus power. I have substituted the words "the Secretary of War" for the words "the board," and have introduced the bill in exactly the same language in which it was passed by the Senate and the House, with the exception that I except from the authority of the Secretary of War such power as may be directed by the Congress to be used for agricultural purposes.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I would like to say in connection with the subject about which the Senator from Tennessee has been speaking that the bill which we passed at the last session of the Congress, providing for taking care of the Muscle Shoals proposition, was not vetoed by the President. We adjourned while the President had the bill in his possession prior to the expiration of the 10-day period within which he might veto it. There is a very serious constitutional question involved as to the legal effect of the action taken by the President. Identically the same question is involved in relation to another bill which met the same fate exactly, having to do with the Okanogan Indians in the State of Washington. That bill is now pending upon an application for a writ of certiorari in the Supreme Court to have the Supreme Court pass on the question of whether or not the bill became a law or whether the action of the President resulted in what is ordinarily known as a pocket veto.

I do not desire to discuss the legal phases of the question now, although I have with some care looked up the question. If the court acts favorably upon the application for the writ of certiorari, which it seems to me it probably will, because there is a very important constitutional question involved, the Okanogan Indians will then be permitted to file the case, and it will come up in the regular way and be heard by the Supreme Court. If the Supreme Court holds that that bill has become a law, then the Muscle Shoals bill, passed at the last session of Congress, is likewise a law.

It seems to me that at the present session of Congress, with that question unsettled and this being the short session, which must expire on the 4th of March, it will probably be impossible to take up a new proposal of that importance and get it through both Houses of Congress, but that we ought to await action by the Supreme Court on the question. In fact, if we did make an attempt to pass another Muscle Shoals bill during the short session, we would probably find it impossible of accomplishment on account of the crowded condition of the calendar and the short time that is left for us to get a bill passed through both Houses and presented to the President.

It has seemed to me, therefore, that we ought to wait at least until the Supreme Court shall have acted upon that question. If the court shall hold the bill to be a law, no action on the part of either branch of Congress will, of course, be necessary.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I realize that what the Senator from Nebraska has just stated is true, but at the same time it seems to me such a grievous waste merely to permit that water to flow over the dam without any return whatsoever that I have selected the Senator's own bill and have merely changed the wording and provided that the Secretary of War shall proceed with that particular phase of it and prevent this great loss to the Government and to the people.

Mr. NORRIS. I agree with the Senator as to that; but, as I understand, no law would be necessary for the Secretary of War, for instance, to permit the town of Muscle Shoals to get power from the dam. I do not understand why that has not been done.

Mr. McKELLAR. Neither do I, but it has not been done.

Mr. NORRIS. No; and I regret that situation just as much as does the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am sure the Senator does.

Mr. NORRIS. But it would be useless for Congress to pass a bill similar to the one we previously passed with the legal effect of the other action being still undecided even if we could do so.

Mr. McKELLAR. I should think that the President could proceed under the proposed authorization to lease the surplus power exactly as provided for in the Senator's bill, which was passed, and of which there was a so-called pocket veto; but I am not passing upon that.

Mr. NORRIS. The bill which has been introduced by the Senator from Tennessee, as I understand his statement, is an exact copy, with the necessary changes to apply to present conditions, of the bill which we previously passed?

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, no; the bill I have introduced is not a copy of the Senator's entire bill, but merely a copy of those particular provisions which relate to the sale of surplus power and giving the Government authority to aid in the building of transmission lines for the use of that surplus power.

Mr. NORRIS. Is the Senator's bill a permanent one or, if it shall be passed, would it apply only until the pending question in dispute may be determined?

Mr. McKELLAR. On the face of the bill, it is permanent.

Mr. NORRIS. Does not the Senator think that with the other question pending and undecided, as I have stated, if we shall enact any legislation it ought to be only of a temporary nature, giving authority until the question in dispute shall have been settled or until Congress can finally dispose of it? I should have no objection to that.

Mr. McKELLAR. Perhaps that suggestion is a very wise one, and I should be very happy to accept it.

I merely feel this way about it: Under the present conditions the power at Muscle Shoals is being used really for the benefit of no one in the world except the Alabama Power Co. I do not think that company ought to be permitted longer to bottle up that great enterprise. I think that power ought to be used for all the people and not simply for the benefit of the Alabama Power Co., as is the situation now. For that reason I should be very happy to accept any suggestion about the temporary character of this proposed law, so that the administration may go on and utilize presently all the surplus power that is being generated or can be generated at Muscle Shoals.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I should like to say to the Senator from Tennessee that I do not believe there is disagreement between us as to what we would like done.

Mr. McKELLAR. I do not think so.

Mr. NORRIS. I am not satisfied any more than is the Senator with present conditions at Muscle Shoals, although it must be said in defense of the action of the Secretary of War in not providing for a better disposition of the power than, under existing conditions, he has not any authority to make a lease or contract that would extend for a sufficient length of time to enable him to get a real good bid for the property. So he is handicapped.

Mr. McKELLAR. I agree with the Senator from Nebraska as to that.

Mr. NORRIS. We all realize that.

Mr. McKELLAR. I realize that, and the purpose of the bill which I have introduced is to remedy that situation. I hope the Senator from Nebraska will look at the bill and see if what it proposes may not be done.

Mr. President, before I take my seat I desire to say that I have here some figures taken from the evidence of Colonel Robins, who is in charge of the Muscle Shoals plant, and I ask that those figures, together with Colonel Robins's testimony, may be inserted in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[From statement of Colonel Robins]

They—meaning the Alabama Power Co.—have brought in another hydroelectric plant of their own, and they use under that 30-day agreement our power in preference to generating power by steam plant, but they use their own water power in preference to ours. They were in better shape this year than they were in previous years, and there has been more rain. So they used less of our power, considerably, in 1928 than they did in 1927.

[From Colonel Robins's testimony]

Colonel ROBINS. In the last year the Alabama Power Co. have put in one new hydroelectric plant and increased the capacity of another of their hydroelectric plants, and during this year there has been more than the usual quantity of water for power purposes in that whole section of the country. While we have had lots of water they have had just as much, so that very naturally, looking at it from their standpoint, they make hay while the sun shines, use their own water power, and are not taking ours.

Mr. BARBOUR. Is there anybody else there you can sell to?

Colonel ROBINS. No, sir.

Mr. BARBOUR. You have got to sell it to the Alabama Power Co.?

Colonel ROBINS. We have got to sell it to them.

* * * * * * *

Colonel ROBINS. During the calendar year 1927 the plant was completely shut down for 21 days. During 1928, to November 1, the plant has been completely shut down for 39 days.

Mr. CLAGUE. What is the average rate at which you sell the power?

Colonel ROBINS. The average rate is about 2.1 mills per kilowatt-hour.

Mr. COLLINS. Isn't it exactly 2 mills?

Colonel ROBINS. Practically.

Mr. COLLINS. It is a sliding scale, but it levels out to 2 mills.

* * * * * * *

Mr. BARBOUR. Does that agreement with the Alabama Power Co. provide for a minimum amount of power that they must take?

Colonel ROBINS. No, sir. They only agree to take the power when otherwise they would have to start up their stand-by steam plants.

Mr. BARBOUR. Could you not get a contract with them by which they would agree to take a minimum amount of power?

Colonel ROBINS. Yes, sir; we could if we could make a contract over any considerable period. If we could go to them and say, "We are ready to make an agreement or contract with you for five years," we could get them to agree to take a minimum amount of power and guarantee a certain income.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, before we pass from the subject of Muscle Shoals, I should like to say a few words. I agree with a great deal that the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR] has said. We have invested $150,000,000 in the Muscle Shoals plant, and about $10,000,000 worth of the equipment is being used, while $140,000,000 worth of it is idle. Such a condition is inexcusable and indefensible. The water is going to waste, but the equipment is all there; and it is up to Congress to do something with it. The Senate passed a bill, which likewise was passed by the other House, that would have disposed of Muscle Shoals, put all of the power to work, and the project would have been bringing good returns to the Government and blessings and benefits to thousands and tens of thousands of people; but the President gave it a pocket veto. It is not the fault of the Senate and it is not the fault of the House that Muscle Shoals is not now in full operation. I hope that the Supreme Court will sustain the contention of the Senator from Nebraska, and if it does not decide as we wish it to decide, I would be ready to support a measure such as that suggested by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR] for the temporary disposition of the power at Muscle Shoals until we can legislate permanently on the subject.

AMENDMENTS TO THE AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. HARRIS submitted two amendments intended to be proposed by him to House bill 15386, the Agricultural Department appropriation bill, which were referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed, as follows:

On page 71, after line 23, insert the following:

"For the control and prevention of spread of the phoney disease in the Peach Belt of Georgia, $15,000, to be immediately available."

On page 35, line 3, strike out "$1,077,231" and insert the following: "$1,162,231: Provided, That $85,000 of such sum is made available for the eradication of the phoney disease in the Peach Belt of Georgia, to be immediately available."

ENFORCEMENT OF THE EIGHTEENTH AMENDMENT

Mr. BLEASE submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the resolution (S. Res. 287) providing for the appointment of a committee of five Senators to investigate the enforcement of the eighteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States (submitted by Mr. JONES on January 3, 1929), which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and ordered to be printed.

DECLINE IN PER CAPITA CONSUMPTION OF WHEAT, 1926

Mr. NYE submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 289), which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry:

Resolved, That the Secretary of Agriculture and the Secretary of Commerce are requested (1) to investigate, in cooperation with each other, the cause or causes of the decline in the per capita consumption of wheat from 5.6 bushels in 1913 to 4.3 bushels in 1926, a decline equivalent to approximately eighty 1-pound loaves of bread, and determine among other things whether the bleaching of flour has had any effect on such decline, and (2) to report to the Senate, as soon as practicable, and in any event not later than the beginning of the next regular session of the Congress, the information resulting from such investigation.

CHANGES OF REFERENCE

On motion of Mr. SHIPSTEAD the Committee on Pensions was discharged from the further consideration of the bill (S. 5167) granting an annuity to Robert K. Brough, and it was referred to the Committee on Civil Service.

On motion of Mr. REED of Pennsylvania the Committee on Military Affairs was discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 9300) for the relief of Joseph N. Marin, and it was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

CONFIRMATIONS OF SOUTH CAROLINA POSTMASTERS

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a preceding day, which will be read.

The legislative clerk read the resolution (S. Res. 286) submitted by Mr. BLEASE January 3, 1929, as follows:

Resolved, That the subcommittee, of which Senator BROOKHART is chairman, now investigating the patronage and post-office situation in South Carolina, be and is requested to inform the Senate if it has any evidence upon which it can or expects to request the Senate not to confirm any person nominated for postmaster in South Carolina.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, I ask the author of the resolution if he would object to having it referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads? It would be a little difficult for a subcommittee to report directly to the Senate; but the subcommittee could report to the full committee, and then the report could be presented to the Senate. I assure the Senator that the matter will be dealt with promptly in the committee, as the Senator is himself a member of the committee.

Mr. BLEASE. That will be satisfactory to me, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

TAXES AND TAX REFUNDS

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I desire to have printed in the RECORD an editorial appearing in the Washington Post of January 4, 1929, on the subject of Lawyers and Tax Experts, and likewise a brief Associated Press article on the subject of Taxes and Refunds.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MCNARY in the chair). Without objection, the articles will be printed in the RECORD, as requested.

The articles are as follows:

LAWYERS AND TAX EXPERTS

The big list of tax refunds recently published, running into millions of dollars, doubtless caused many citizens to believe that Uncle Sam had voluntarily made a prompt and generous amends for his errors in collecting excess taxes. But another picture is presented by one of the concerns that appeared in the lists.

George F. Johnson, of the Endicott-Johnson Co., shoe manufacturers, points out that his company paid $851,808 in excess of what was legally due in taxes and that it recovered the money, but only after it had paid out $306,682 "to lawyers and tax experts." So it is out of pocket that amount, all because of the illegal exactions of the Treasury. "I have always thought," observes Mr. Johnson, "that if the Government had to pay in addition to the money due, with interest, the cost of legal service, they would be more careful about assessing and collecting illegal taxes."

Practically all of the corporations that paid illegal taxes were forced to hire lawyers and tax experts to recover the money. If the cost of this service was 35 per cent of the amount recovered, as in the case of the Endicott-Johnson Co., it is evident that the errors of the Treasury Department cost taxpayers at least $35,000,000 during the last fiscal year.

Uncle Sam may be a little hard on taxpayers, but see what a Santa Claus he is to lawyers and tax experts!

TAXES AND REFUNDS DEBATED IN HOUSE—COMPROMISE ON UNITED STATES STEEL'S CLAIM AT $26,000,000, TOLD IN REPORT—STATES ASK $200,000,000

(Associated Press)

The question of illegally collected taxes and their refund by the Government drew the attention of the House yesterday from three widely separated angles.

One was in a report of the Appropriations Committee telling of a compromise settlement of tax refunds, involving $26,000,000, to the United States Steel Corporation.

In the same report this committee also disclosed that the Treasury since 1917 had collected $4,061,769,209 in back taxes but during that period had refunded $975,012,356 which it had illegally taken from taxpayers.

The third angle developed at the Ways and Means Committee when it started hearings on a resolution proposing that the Federal Government reimburse 26 States for $200,000,000 direct taxes which the State governments contend were illegally collected in the years of 1866 to 1868, directly following the Civil War.

INTEREST TOTALS $11,000,000

The details of the proposed settlement with the Steel Corporation were given to the Appropriations Committee in testimony by Assistant Secretary Bond, of the Treasury, who said it would include the Government's payment of $15,000,000 in tax refunds plus $11,000,000 interest.

If the settlement is accepted by the steel company in lieu of the $161,000,000 for which it had sued, Bond said the case would be "closed forever."

Representative GARNER of Texas, one of the Democratic leaders, recently criticized on the House floor the proposal for the refunds to the steel company.

Describing the proposed settlement as "more of a compromise by the taxpayer than the Government," Bond explained that the original return of the company for 1917 showed a tax of about $199,000,000, but due to errors in determining whether certain income on long-term contracts of the concern and its subsidiaries belonged to 1916 or 1917 this tax was whittled down to $173,000,000. The first year in which the excess-profits tax was paid was 1917.

STATES FACE HARD BATTLE

Indications that the States in their efforts to recover the post-Civil War alleged illegally collected direct taxes face a strenuous fight developed in the Ways and Means Committee hearing on this question. States' rights, the statute of limitations, and the definiteness of their claims were debated by witnesses and members of the committee.

Secretary Mellon in a letter to the committee declared that not only several hundreds of millions of dollars would be required to settle all claims for illegally collected direct taxes since 1868, but it was doubtful if any accurate records on the States' claims could be produced as some of them had been destroyed with congressional consent.

In another letter Attorney General Sargent said the suit of the States should be brought before the Court of Claims not before the Supreme Court, as provided in the resolution.

Senator STEPHENS, Democrat, Mississippi, a principal witness for the States, argued that the States have been "treated unjustly" and that the "United States ought to pay its debts." Representative CHINDBLOM, of Illinois, a Republican member of the committee, contended that the statute of limitations had run out on the claims and that the States had been lax in pushing their suits.

MEXICAN IMMIGRATION

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, I ask permission to have placed in the RECORD a letter I wrote Secretary Davis, of the Department of Labor, and his reply furnishing information relative to the admission of immigrants from Mexico. I hope all Senators may take the time to read this letter.

During the last session of Congress I introduced a bill placing Mexico under the quota basis, just as all other countries are under the immigration law. At the time this law was passed I offered an amendment to place Mexico under the quota, which would permit only about 1,500 Mexicans to come into our country instead of an average of more than 50,000, which have been coming here—which is about one-third the total number that can come from all countries. My amendment was voted down, but last session I again introduced an amendment to the immigration bill placing Mexico under the quota.

The Immigration Committee, of which I am a member, held extensive hearings last session, and just before the Senate adjourned for the holidays the committee unanimously approved my measure. It is now on the calendar and I have urged that it be considered at an early date. My measure has been indorsed by the American Federation of Labor, the American Legion, Veterans of All Wars, many patriotic societies, and Secretary Davis, who has rendered such splendid service in the Department of Labor having charge of the enforcement of the immigration laws, has in many speeches throughout the country favored my measure.

It is a great discrimination against the cotton growers of my section, where we grow less cotton than a few years ago, for the Mexican cheap labor to come into this country without limit and produce a few million additional bales of cotton making a surplus which brings down the price of cotton made by American labor.

The reading of the letter of Secretary Davis will convince anyone that my measure should pass, and I hope we may soon vote on it. I shall continue urging the matter. I oppose allowing our country to become flooded with Europeans or Asiatics.

I also ask to place in the RECORD an editorial on Mexican immigration from the Santa Rosa Republican.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

UNITED STATES SENATE, COMMITTEE ON APPROPRIATIONS,
December 15, 1928.

Hon. JAMES J. DAVIS,
Secretary of Labor, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: In a recent debate in the Senate it was stated, in part, "If we could guard that Mexican border adequately we would not need to change the law at all, because the present-day requirements, under the act of 1917, as to literacy and physical health are sufficient to keep out 90 per cent of the Mexicans who are now coming in."

In view of pending legislation, in which it is proposed to include Mexico in the list of so-called quota countries, I will be glad to have your comment relative to the enforcement of the immigration laws on the Mexican border, with particular reference to the above-quoted opinion, which, as I understand it, is to the effect that only 10 per cent of the Mexicans who are now admitted from Mexico through regular channels are actually entitled to enter the United States.

How many Mexicans have been admitted as immigrants in each year since 1921, and what are the facts as to the age, sex, destination in the United States, etc., of such immigrants as shown in the statistical records of the Immigration Service?

What is the history of the war-time order removing certain restrictions on immigration from Mexico?

How many Mexicans were resident in the United States, according to the census of 1920, and in what States and cities were they found in greatest numbers? How does this record compare with the censuses of 1900 and 1910?

What is the illiteracy rate in the population of Mexico and among natives of Mexico in the United States?

Do Mexicans who come to the United States as immigrants remain here or do they return to Mexico? Has there been any change in this regard in recent years?

To what extent have natives of Mexico acquired American citizenship through naturalization?

If the quota law of 1921 had been applied to Mexico, what would have been the annual quota of that country? What would the quota be under the present law?

Generally speaking, what is the situation, so far as labor supply and demand are concerned, and are there indications that an increased foreign-labor supply will be needed during the coming year?

What countries are the principal sources of our present immigration?

Sincerely yours,

WM. J. HARRIS.

DEPARTMENT OF LABOR,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, December 28, 1928.

Hon. WILLIAM J. HARRIS,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I want to assure you that careful consideration has been given to your letter of December 15, in which you make several specific inquiries concerning immigration from Mexico and the distribution of Mexican immigrants in the various States and cities of the country, and I am giving you herewith the desired information, so far as it is available to the department and the Bureau of Immigration.

For convenience your queries are repeated and commented upon in the order in which they are presented:

"In a recent debate in the Senate it was stated in part, 'If we could guard that Mexican border adequately, we would not need to change the law at all, because the present-day requirements, under the act of 1917, as to literacy and physical health, are sufficient to keep out 90 per cent of the Mexicans who are now coming in.'

"In view of the pending legislation, in which it is proposed to include Mexico in the list of so-called quota countries, I will be glad to have your comment relative to the enforcement of the immigration laws on the Mexican border, with particular reference to the above-quoted opinion, which, as I understand it, is to the effect that only 10 per cent of the Mexicans who are now admitted from Mexico through the regular channels are actually entitled to enter the United States."

I am glad that you have asked me to comment upon this particular statement, which can be construed as nothing more or less than a charge that the Bureau of Immigration and the department are neglecting to enforce the immigration laws so far as the Mexican border is concerned. This unwarranted charge is only another indication of the fact that there is much misunderstanding concerning the immigration situation on our southern land boundary. Whatever may have been the situation on that border in the past, during recent years we have succeeded in enforcing the law so far as applicants for regular admission are concerned to an extent which, I think, is fairly comparable with such enforcement at seaports of entry and on the Canadian border. Of course, I am not unmindful of the fact that the Immigration Service deals with a different type of people at Mexican border ports of entry than at other ports, but I want to assure you that immigrants from Mexico are not admitted unless they meet the requirements laid down in the general immigration act of 1917, as well as in the act of 1924.

In the fiscal year ending June 30, last, a total of 59,016 immigrant aliens were admitted from Mexico, and of these 57,765 were of the Mexican race. As provided in the 1924 act, such immigrants are required to secure immigration visas from an American consul, and from the fact that 58,110 such visas were issued in Mexico during the year under consideration it is seen there is no important difference between the visas issued and the immigrants admitted. This means that applicants were first inspected by American consuls, as the law requires, and having met the tests applied by consuls they presented their visas to the immigration authorities at ports of entry, where they were medically inspected by officers of the United States Public Health Service and finally by the immigration authorities. In other words, they were subjected to the same procedure that applies in the case of immigrants coming from any country, and that being the case the statement that 90 per cent of them were actually inadmissible under the law is obviously ridiculous.

You will observe that the foregoing concerns regular immigration, which may be defined as aliens who have resided permanently in Mexico and who are admitted to the United States for permanent residence here. If it is the desire of Congress to materially reduce or limit the volume of such immigration, it is an absolute certainty that it can not be done under the present immigration laws.

The problem of aliens who are admitted to the United States as temporary visitors for business or pleasure and who fail to depart within a stipulated time, of course, exists on the Mexican border, just as it exists at Canadian border ports and to a lesser extent at seaports of arrival. The general immigration law contemplates that the passing back and forth over the land borders of temporary visitors shall be facilitated rather than hampered. Section 23 of the act of 1917 making it the duty of the Commissioner General of Immigration to "prescribe rules for the entry and inspection of aliens coming to the United States from or through Canada and Mexico, so as not unnecessarily to delay, impede, or annoy persons in ordinary travel between the United States and said countries. * * * Obviously, this is a wise and necessary provision, but it is also obvious that in attempting to carry out the spirit of the law its purpose is to some extent defeated.

The much-discussed General Order No. 86, relative to land-border crossing procedure, the validity of which is now being tested in the courts, was promulgated with a view to eliminating so far as possible abuses arising under the privileges which the law grants to residents of foreign contiguous territory seeking to enter the country as temporary visitors. This general order, which was issued on April 1, 1927, provides in effect that aliens residing in foreign contiguous countries and entering the United States to engage in existing employment or to seek employment in this country will not be considered as visiting the United States temporarily as tourists, or temporarily for business or pleasure, under any provisions of the immigration law which exempt visitors from complying with certain requirements thereof; that is, they will be considered as aliens of the "immigrant" class.

As you doubtless know, the legality of this order was upheld in a district court decision, which was reversed by the circuit court of appeals and is now before the Supreme Court for final determination. The immigration authorities in the various districts on both the northern and southern land boundaries fully understand that the department and Bureau of Immigration will be satisfied with nothing less than an adequate enforcement of this rule, and it is conceded that it has had a highly beneficial effect in affording a better control of the visitor class.

In a recent communication to the chairmen of the Senate and House Committees on Immigration I discussed the legal situation that has arisen in connection with General Order, No. 86, and have pointed out the necessity for immediate legislative action in the event an adverse decision is handed down from the Supreme Court. Consequently, I shall not attempt a further discussion of this important matter at this time.

"How many Mexicans have been admitted as immigrants in each year since 1921, and what are the facts as to the age, sex, destination in the United States, etc., of such immigrants as shown in the statistical records of the Immigration Service?"

1925	32,378
1926	42,638
1927	66,766
1928	57,765
Annual average	49,719

In connection with the marked increase during the years 1923 and 1924 it may be noted that numbers multiplied in spite of the fact that every feasible attempt was being made to bring about a more strict enforcement of the law on the border, and the increased immigration in those years is simply another indication of the fact that the provisions of the law relative to illiteracy, physical condition, etc., afford no adequate barriers so far as numbers are concerned. The sharp decline in the fiscal year 1925 is due largely to the visa and other requirements of the immigration act of 1924, which considerably increased the cost of immigration to the individual immigrant, but it is obvious that even this has not been effective in subsequent years.

The character of Mexican immigration with respect to age, sex, destination in the United States, etc., does not change materially from year to year and the items relating to immigrants admited during the last fiscal year are typical of such as a whole.

"What is the history of the war-time order removing certain restrictions on immigration from Mexico?"

The so-called war-time order of the Department of Labor, under which the literacy, contract labor, and head-tax provisions of the law were waived in behalf of Mexicans and other aliens coming from certain other sources for the purpose of agricultural labor, etc., was in force from May, 1917, to March 2, 1921. According to reports of the Commissioner General of Immigration, a total of 72,862 Mexicans were admitted under this order. Of this number, 34,922 had returned to Mexico by June 30, 1921; 414 died; 494 were examined for permanent residence and found eligible for admission; and 21,400 deserted their employment and disappeared. The Commissioner General states that of those who deserted their employment and disappeared, it is likely that a considerable percentage found their way back to Mexico.

"How many Mexicans were resident in the United States according to the census of 1920, and in what States and cities were they found in greatest numbers? How does this record compare with the censuses of 1900 and 1910?"

The following table shows the total number of natives of Mexico who were resident in the United States in the census years 1900, 1910, and 1920, and the principal States of residence in those years:

State	1920	1910	1900
Texas	251,827	125,016	71,062
California	88,771	33,694	8,086
Arizona	61,580	29,987	14,172
New Mexico	20,272	11,918	6,649
Kansas	13,770	8,429	71
Colorado	11,037	2,602	274
Oklahoma	6,884	2,744	134
Illinois	4,032	672	156
Missouri	3,411	1,413	162
New York	2,999	555	353
Iowa	2,650	620	29
Nebraska	2,611	290	27
Louisiana	2,487	1,025	488
Pennsylvania	1,818	153	110
Wyoming	1,801	188	58
Idaho	1,215	133	28
Nevada	1,177	732	98
Utah	1,166	166	41
All other States	6,910	1,578	1,395
Total	486,418	221,915	103,393

The principal cities of residence of natives of Mexico in the three census years under consideration were:

City	1920	1910	1900
San Antonio	28,477	9,924	3,288
Los Angeles	21,653	5,632	817
Houston	3,953	491	118
Fort Worth	3,831	426	59
San Francisco	3,810	1,792	1,459
New York	2,572	426	282
Dallas	2,295	134	41
Kansas City, Kans	2,043	102	3
Kansas City, Mo	1,920	233	24
Denver	1,418	226	19
New Orleans	1,306	289	299
Chicago	1,224	188	102
Oakland	1,033	252	95
Omaha	746	23	5
Salt Lake City	217	44	4
Other cities of 25,000	55,124	17,631	750

The above figures show a very decided tendency on the part of our Mexican-born population to become city dwellers. For example, the Mexican-born population of the State of Texas just about doubled between 1910 and 1920, but in the same 10 years there was a threefold increase in the city of San Antonio and eightfold increases in Houston and Fort Worth.

"What is the illiteracy rate in the population of Mexico and among natives of Mexico in the United States?"

The United States Bureau of Education advises that the illiteracy rate in Mexico is estimated at about 62 per cent of the population, including persons of all ages. The census reports do not show illiteracy in the United States by country of birth, and the department has no knowledge of Mexicans in the United States. When it is considered that more than one-third of the people in Mexico of all ages are literate it becomes apparent that the literacy requirements of the general immigration law, referred to in the recent Senate debate, can not be depended upon as a means of reducing immigration from that country.

"Do Mexicans who come to the United States as immigrants remain here, or do they return to Mexico? Has there been any change in this regard in recent years?"

There is no official record of the number of alien residents leaving the United States for permanent residence abroad prior to the fiscal year 1908, when steamship lines were first required by law to furnish manifests of outgoing alien passengers. The immigration act of 1917 amended the law in this particular by providing also that immigration officials shall record certain information concerning aliens leaving the United States by way of the Canadian and Mexican borders for permanent residence in a foreign country. Comparatively few aliens return to Mexico by sea, so that the records from 1908 to and including 1917 are of little or no value. Moreover, it is obviously difficult to make a record of all aliens leaving the United States over the land borders, and field officers of the Immigration Service tell me that the figures reported for the Mexican border are not complete. However this may be, existing records show a very considerable decrease in the movement of Mexicans returning to Mexico for permanent residence in the last few years. The figures in this regard from 1918 to 1928 are given below:

Year	Mexicans admitted	Mexicans departed
1918	17,602	25,084
1919	28,844	17,793
1920	51,042	6,412
1922	18,246	5,770
1923	62,709	2,479
1924	87,648	1,878
1925	32,378	2,875
1926	42,638	3,158
1927	66,766	2,774
Total	495,241	77,615

The records of the Census Bureau appear to substantiate our immigration records as to the flow and ebb of Mexican immigration. For example, 318,674 Mexican immigrant aliens were regularly admitted to the United States during the 10 years from July 1, 1910, to June 30, 1920, and the records—which, as already stated, are faulty at least until 1918—show that 54,404 emigrant aliens of the same race departed during the same 10 years, leaving a net gain of 264,270. According to the census of 1910, there were 221,915 natives of Mexico resident in the United States in that year and 486,418 in 1920, the increase of 264,503 being almost identical with that shown in the Immigration Bureau statistics. Of course, no one who is acquainted with the Mexican border situation will contend that no Mexicans entered illegally, or that all who left the country were recorded; but considering these and other factors that affect the situation, our immigration figures certainly present a good picture of the growth of Mexican population.

"To what extent have natives of Mexico acquired American citizenship through naturalization?"

Of the 478,383 natives of Mexico of the white race resident in the United States according to the census of 1920, 22,732, or 4.8 per cent, were fully naturalized and 2,989 had secured their first papers. In the matter of acquiring citizenship, natives of Mexico ranked last among the various nationalities, their nearest competitors for last place being natives of Albania, 7.4 per cent of whom were naturalized in 1920. The commissioner of naturalization advises that during the past five fiscal years a total of 497 citizens of Mexico have been granted United States citizenship, the distribution of these, by years, being as follows:

"If the quota law of 1921 had been applied to Mexico, what would have been the annual quota of that country? What would the quota be under the present law?"

Under the 1921 law quotas were fixed at 3 per cent of the population as shown by the census of 1910. According to that census, there were 221,915 natives of Mexico in the United States, and accordingly that country's annual quota would have been 6,657. According to the census of 1890 a total of 77,854 natives of Mexico were resident in the United States at that time. Accordingly, the quota available for natives of Mexico under the act of 1924 would be 2 per cent of that number, or 1,557.

"Generally speaking, what is the situation so far as labor supply and demand are concerned, and are there indications that an increased foreign labor supply will be needed during the coming year?"

In reply to this inquiry let me quote the following extract from a statement just issued by the Director General of the United States Employment Service:

"After a careful survey of business and industrial conditions, and improvements and developments now in the offing, we predict that 1929 will be a good year.

"The iron and steel industry is in a healthy condition, and the prospects are for further improvement. Reports from the automotive industry indicate that 1929 will be an outstanding year in the history of automobile manufacture. The textile industry has worked itself into a better position and it is expected that it will continue to improve. Reports from miscellaneous industries describe the outlook for the new year as bright. The expected development and expansion of the aircraft industry should offer employment opportunities for many skilled workmen. A tremendous road-building program will be under way as soon as weather conditions will permit. The prospects are that building construction will equal, and perhaps surpass, the splendid record of 1928. Opportunities for skilled tradesmen appear to be very promising. Agricultural employment prospects for the year are regarded as very good.

"In view of the sound business conditions and the excellent prospects for the year, it appears that labor on the whole will be well employed; but there will be some unemployment, particularly amongst the white-collar class and manual and unskilled workers."

What countries are the principal sources of our present immigration?

The principal sources of immigration in the fiscal year 1928 were as follows:

Canada	73,154
Mexico	59,016
Germany	45,778
Irish Free State	24,544
Great Britain and Northern Ireland	20,682
Italy	17,728
Poland	8,755
Norway	5,660

The above figures represent the number of immigrant aliens admitted who had last resided permanently in the countries named. They should not be confused with the statistics in which immigrants are classified by races or peoples, or by countries of birth. For example, the annual quota of Italy under the act of 1924 is 3,845, and yet 17,728 immigrant aliens were admitted from that country in the fiscal year 1928. This discrepancy is accounted for by the fact 12,686 wives and children of American citizens, together with lesser numbers of other classes, who are also accorded a nonquota status under the law, were admitted during the year. On the other hand, only 20,682 immigrant aliens who had last resided in Great Britain and Northern Ireland were admitted in 1928, although the annual quota of that area is 34,007 and was exhausted for the year. This is due to the fact that many natives of England, Scotland, Wales, and Northern Ireland who reside in Canada or other countries secure their British visas in such countries and are recorded as coming from them rather than from the country of their birth.

In connection with the foregoing discussion of immigration from Mexico I am venturing to bring to your attention Senate bill 3019, Seventieth Congress, first session, which in part deals with that subject, as well as with immigration from other countries of the New World. You will note the bill proposes that the quota principle in a modified form be applied to immigration from such countries, and also that provision is made for the temporary admission from foreign contiguous territory of a limited number of aliens to perform seasonal or emergency labor, such provision being limited to a period of two years, the purpose being to avoid any real embarrassment to employers of agricultural and other labor in the border States that might follow the immediate application of the quota to foreign contiguous countries. In my judgment the provisions of Senate bill 3019, in respect to immigration from the present nonquota countries, is entirely worthy of serious consideration.

I am inclosing a copy of the Senate committee print containing my comments on the bill in question.

Sincerely yours,

JAMES J. DAVIS.

[Editorial from the Santa Rosa (Calif.) Republican]

PEON SALVE FOR "ITCHING PALMS"

Veterans of Foreign Wars are conducting a vigorous educational campaign throughout the State to acquaint a more or less apathetic public with the menace of an increasing influx of Mexican peons into southern California. These undesirables have heretofore been allowed to "crash" our southern international boundary gates without apparent let or hindrance on the part of Federal immigration officials.

Just the other day a foreign war veteran, over the radio, told of the horrible conditions existing in Los Angeles County. In one subdivision there—the Belvedere district—out of a population of 40,000 Mexicans there were only 250 registered voters. Almost the entire population were people of preponderantly Indian blood who are ineligible for American citizenship and who, solely on that account—to say nothing of a hundred other reasons—should never have been allowed to enter the country in the first place.

A press dispatch Saturday from Washington intimated that Congress was ready to consider the Harris immigration bill, placing Mexico under a definite quota, as should have been done in the act of 1921. Senator HARRIS, Democrat of Georgia, author of the measure, said that he was confident the bill would be considered shortly after Christmas, and predicted that it would pass.

If railroads and farms in southern California could be induced to pay a decent living wage to white labor, there would be no need to import this peon riffraff. To become legally eligible for American entry, a Mexican must have a "preponderance of white blood." This law has not been enforced. Peon salve should not be allowed to allay itching palms. The Harris bill offers a solution. It should be passed immediately, and immediately enforced.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Seventy-six Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present. The Senator from Virginia will proceed.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, we are considering for ratification a treaty which has occasioned much difference of opinion. Its overzealous advocates have claimed that it abolishes or outlaws war and marks an epoch in the history of world affairs which will result in the consummation of perpetual peace. Its critics and opponents insist that it is a feeble gesture for peace, is worthless as a peace pact, and instead of outlawing war legalizes war, and that any war that has been conducted for centuries would be permissible under this so-called "peace pact."

Let us dispassionately, without being influenced by the vehement declarations of the advocates or opponents of this treaty, examine it and ascertain its full and fair meaning—what it permits and what it forbids—so that we can determine calmly and intelligently whether or not we should exercise our constitutional right to advise and consent to its ratification, and, if we do, whether it needs further interpretations or reservations.

Since every document is construed by giving consideration to the circumstances under which it was entered into, and the declarations made during the negotiations, and the understandings arrived at regarding its interpretation before the instrument was signed, we will examine those that are relevant to the treaty.

On the tenth anniversary of the entrance of the United States into the World War, M. Briand, Secretary of State of France, proposed to the United States that the two countries should enter into a treaty of perpetual friendship and peace. After much discussion, on June 20, 1927, the Government of France submitted to the Government of the United States the proposed pact, the substance of which is as follows:

ARTICLE 1

The high contracting powers solemnly declare, in the name of the French people and the people of the United States of America, that they condemn recourse to war and renounce it, respectively, as an instrument of their national policy toward each other.

ARTICLE 2

The settlement or the solution of all disputes or conflicts, of whatever nature or of whatever origin they may be, which may arise between France and the United States of America, shall never be sought by either side except by pacific means.

On December 28, 1927, Secretary of State Kellogg made a reply to the French Government regarding this overture, in which he said:

* * * it has occurred to me that the two Governments, instead of contenting themselves with a bilateral declaration of the nature suggested by M. Briand, might make a more signal contribution to world peace by joining in an effort to obtain the adherence of all of the principal powers of the world to a declaration renouncing war as an instrument of national policy. Such a declaration, if executed by the principal world powers, could not but be an impressive example to all the other nations of the world, and might conceivably lead such nations to subscribe in their turn to the same instrument, thus perfecting among all the powers of the world an arrangement heretofore suggested only as between France and the United States.

The Government of the United States is prepared, therefore, to concert with the Government of France with a view to the conclusion of a treaty among the principal powers of the world, open to signature by all nations, condemning war and renouncing it as an instrument of national policy in favor of the pacific settlement of international disputes.

On January 5, 1928, the French Government replied to the suggestions made by Secretary of State Kellogg, in which reply it stated:

I am authorized to inform you that the Government of the Republic is disposed to join with the Government of the United States in proposing for agreement by all nations a treaty to be signed at the present time by France and the United States and under the terms of which the high contracting parties shall renounce all war of aggression, and shall declare that for the settlement of differences of whatever nature which may arise between them they will employ all pacific means. The high contracting parties will engage to bring this treaty to the attention of all states and invite them to adhere.

It should be noted that the terms of the French proposal were for the renouncement of all war of aggression, but it declares for the settlement of all differences of whatever nature which may arise by the employment of all pacific means.

On January 11, 1928, Secretary Kellogg replied to the French proposals. I shall only quote that portion of the reply which throws light upon the proper construction of the treaty now pending in the Senate. Secretary Kellogg said:

In the second place, and this point is closely related to what goes before, M. Briand's reply of January 5, 1928, in expressing the willingness of the Government of France to join with the Government of the United States in proposing a multilateral treaty for the renunciation of war, apparently contemplates that the scope of such treaty should be limited to wars of aggression. The form of treaty which your Government submitted to me last June which was the subject of my note of December 28, 1927, contained no such qualification or limitation.

I am not informed of the reasons which have led your Government to suggest this modification of its original proposal, but I earnestly hope that it is of no particular significance and that it is not to be taken as an indication that the Government of France will find itself unable to join with the Government of the United States in proposing, as suggested above, that the original formula submitted by M. Briand which envisaged the unqualified renunciation of all war as an instrument of national policy be made the subject of preliminary discussions with the other great powers for the purpose of reaching a tentative agreement as to the language to be used in the proposed treaty.

If your Government is agreeable to the plan outlined above and is willing that further discussions of the terms of the proposed multilateral treaty be based upon the original proposal submitted to me by M. Briand last June, I have the honor to suggest that the Government of France join with the Government of the United States in a communication to the British, German, Italian, and Japanese Governments transmitting the text of M. Briand's original proposal and copies of the subsequent correspondence between the Governments of France and the United States for their consideration and comment, it being understood, of course, that these preliminary discussions would in no way commit any of the participating Governments pending the conclusion of a definitive treaty.

On January 21, 1928, the French Government replied to the proposal of Mr. Kellogg, and I shall only quote the portion of this reply which is pertinent to the question before us. It is as follows:

There is, however, a situation of fact to which my Government has requested me to draw your particular attention.

The American Government can not be unaware of the fact that the great majority of the powers of the world, and among them most of the principal powers, are making the organization and strengthening of peace the object of common efforts carried on within the framework of the League of Nations. They are already bound to one another by a covenant placing them under reciprocal obligations, as well as by agreements such as those signed at Locarno in October, 1925, or by international conventions relative to guaranties of neutrality, all of which engagements impose upon them duties which they can not contravene.

* * * Subject to these observations, the Government of the Republic would, moreover, very gladly welcome any suggestions offered by the American Government which would make it possible to reconcile an absolute condemnation of war with the engagements and obligations assumed by the several nations and the legitimate concern for their respective security.

On February 27, 1928, Secretary of State Kellogg replied to this note, which reply contains the following statements:

* * * As I understand your note of January 21, 1928, the only substantial obstacle in the way of unqualified acceptance by France of the proposals which I submitted in my notes of December 28, 1927, and January 11, 1928, is your Government's doubt whether as a member of the League of Nations and a party to the treaties of Locarno and other treaties guaranteeing neutrality France can agree with the United States and the other principal world powers not to resort to war in their mutual relations without ipso facto violating her present international obligations under those treaties. In your excellency's last note this question was suggested for consideration. If, however, members of the League of Nations can not, without violating the terms of the covenant of the league, agree among themselves and with the Government of the United States to renounce war as an instrument of their national policy, it seems idle to discuss either bilateral or multilateral treaties unreservedly renouncing war. I am reluctant to believe, however, that the provisions of the covenant of the League of Nations really stand in the way of the cooperation of the United States and members of the League of Nations in a common effort to abolish the institution of war. * * *

I trust, therefore, that neither France nor any other member of the League of Nations will finally decide that an unequivocal and unqualified renunciation of war as an instrument of national policy either violates the specific obligations imposed by the covenant or conflicts with the fundamental idea and purpose of the League of Nations. On the contrary, is it not entirely reasonable to conclude that a formal engagement of this character entered into by all of the principal powers, and ultimately, I trust, by the entire family of nations, would be a most effective instrument for promoting the great ideal of peace which the league itself has so closely at heart? If, however, such a declaration were accompanied by definitions of the word "aggressor" and by exceptions and qualifications stipulating when nations would be justified in going to war, its effect would be very greatly weakened and its positive value as a guaranty of peace virtually destroyed. * * * I therefore renew the suggestion contained in my note of January 11, 1928, that the Government of France join with the Government of the United States in transmitting to the British, Italian, German, and Japanese Governments for their consideration and comment the text of M. Briand's original proposal, together with copies of the subsequent correspondence between France and the United States as a basis for preliminary discussions looking to the conclusion of an appropriate multilateral treaty proscribing recourse to war.

On March 30, 1928, the French Government replied to the proposals of Secretary Kellogg, and, as heretofore, I shall only read that portion of the reply which is directly pertinent to the pending pact:

At the same time it is clear that in order not to turn an instrument of progress and peace into a means of oppression, if one of the signatory states should fail to keep its word, the other signatories should be released from their engagement with respect to the offending state. On this second point, as on the first, the French Government believes itself fully in accord with the Government of the United States.

My Government likewise gathers from the declarations which your excellency was good enough to make to me on the 1st of last March, the assurance that the renunciation of war, thus proclaimed, would not deprive the signatories of the right of legitimate defense. Such an interpretation tends to dissipate apprehensions, and the French Government is happy to note it.

I wish the Senate to understand clearly that the negotiations proceeded with a complete reservation of the right of legitimate self-defense without limitation or equivocation. I read further. I wish to do this because the speech of Mr. Kellogg on April 28, 1928, was based on a reply and interpretation to satisfy the request contained in this note of the French Government:

If such is the attitude of the American Government on these three fundamental points, and if it is clearly understood in a general way that the obligations of the new pact should not be substituted for, or prejudice in any way, previous obligations contained in international instruments such as the covenant of the League of Nations, the Locarno agreements, or treaties guaranteeing neutrality whose character and scope can not be modified thereby, then the differences of opinion which have appeared in the course of previous phases of the negotiation have to do more with words than with the reality of the problem facing the two Governments to-day.

Hence, in accordance with the proposal contained in your note of January 11, which you kindly renewed in your note of the 27th of February, the French Government would be prepared forthwith to join with the Government of the United States in submitting for the consideration of the Governments of Germany, Great Britain, Italy, and Japan the correspondence exchanged between France and the United States since June, 1927, and in proposing at the same time for the assent of the four Governments a draft agreement essentially corresponding in purpose to the original proposal of M. Briand in the multipartite form desired by the United States with the changes of wording made necessary by the new concept; the signatory powers of such an instrument, while not prejudicing their rights of legitimate defense within the framework of existing treaties, should make a solemn declaration condemning recourse to war as an instrument of national policy or, in other words, as a means of carrying out their own spontaneous, independent policy.

These are the terms upon which France was willing to conduct the negotiations and reach an agreement. Let us ascertain what was especially specified:

First. Legitimate self-defense in each nation, without limitation or restriction.

Second. That the obligations contained in the covenant of the League of Nations, the obligations of the Locarno treaties, which they intended not to obviate by any agreement, and the neutrality treaties should be preserved and not be interfered with by the proposed pact.

On April 13, 1928, the United States Government delivered to the Governments of Great Britain, Germany, Italy, and Japan identic notes, in which notes it submitted its proposed multilateral pact to make effective its suggestions. The suggested draft of the treaty in its preamble contained the following pertinent matter:

Desirous by formal act to bear unmistakable witness that they condemn war as an instrument of national policy and renounce it in favor of the pacific settlement of international disputes.

Hopeful that, encouraged by their example, all the other nations of the world will join in this humane endeavor and by adhering to the present treaty as soon as it comes into force bring their peoples within the scope of its beneficent provisions, thus uniting the civilized nations of the world in a common renunciation of war as an instrument of their national policy.

The draft treaty was as follows:

ARTICLE 1

The high contracting parties solemnly declare in the names of their respective peoples that they condemn recourse to war for the solution of international controversies, and renounce it as an instrument of national policy in their relations with one another.

The high contracting parties agree that the settlement or solution of all disputes or conflicts of whatever nature or of whatever origin they may be, which may arise among them, shall never be sought except by pacific means.

On April 20, 1928, the French Government submitted to the various governments its draft of a proposed multilateral pact, which I shall read. It must be understood that France proposed to submit a multilateral pact, Kellogg proposed to submit a multilateral pact, and the nations were to consider these and reach a conclusion regarding the one that would ultimately be signed. I will read the French multilateral proposition, since it has not been read to the Senate. It is as follows:

The high contracting parties without any intention to infringe upon the exercise of their rights of legitimate self-defense within the framework of existing treaties, particularly when the violation of certain of the provisions of such treaties constitutes a hostile act, solemnly declare that they condemn recourse to war and renounce it as an instrument of national policy; that is to say, as an instrument of individual, spontaneous, and independent political action taken on their own initiative, and not action in respect of which they might become involved through the obligation of a treaty such as the covenant of the League of Nations or any other treaty registered with the League of Nations. They undertake on these conditions not to attack or invade one another.

That is clear, distinct, and positive, that the covenant of the League of Nations, the Locarno treaties, and the neutrality treaties, were not to be interfered with by this pact.

ARTICLE 2

The settlement or solution of all disputes or conflicts, of whatever nature or origin, which might arise among the high contracting parties or between any two of them, shall never be sought on either side except by pacific methods.

ARTICLE 3

In case one of the high contracting parties should contravene this treaty the other contracting powers would ipso facto be released with respect to that party from their obligations under this treaty.

ARTICLE 4

The provisions of this treaty in no wise affect the rights and obligations of the contracting parties resulting from prior international agreements to which they are parties.

In considering the replies of the Governments to the Kellogg proposal, it must also be understood and remembered that the French pact had been sent to each Government and the replies were made with each pact pending before the chancellories.

These proposals were sent to the Governments previously named. On April 27, 1928, the German Government transmitted a note, the substance of which is as follows:

So far as Germany is concerned, the covenant of the League of Nations and the Rhine pact of Locarno come into consideration as international agreements which might affect the substance of the new pact; other international obligations of this kind have not been entered into by Germany. Respect for the obligations arising from the covenant of the League of Nations and the Rhine pact must, in the opinion of the German Government, remain inviolable. The German Government is, however, convinced that these obligations contain nothing which could in any way conflict with the obligations provided for in the draft treaty of the United States. On the contrary, it believes that the binding obligation not to use war as an instrument of national policy could only serve to strengthen the fundamental idea of the covenant of the League of Nations and of the Rhine pact.

The German Government proceeds on the belief that a pact after the pattern submitted by the Government of the United States would not put in question the sovereign right of any state to defend itself. It is self-evident that if one state violates the pact the other contracting parties regain their freedom of action with reference to that state. The state affected by the violation of the pact is therefore not prevented from taking up arms on its own part against the breaker of the peace. * * *

The German Government can accordingly declare that it is ready to conclude a pact in accordance with the proposal of the Government of the United States and to this end to enter into the necessary negotiations with the governments concerned.

What does that disclose? It is clear, distinct, and incontrovertible that Germany reserves to herself, in interpreting this treaty, an absolute right of self-defense, without limitation in regard to territory or anything else, an absolute, inherent right of self-defense. Second, it reserved to itself the obligations contained in the covenant of the League of Nations and the Rhine pact, known as the Locarno treaty.

In these conditions and understandings, distinct, clear, and specific, Germany accepts the treaty proposed.

On May 4, 1928, the Italian Government replied. Its reply in a general way gave its assent to the multilateral treaty, but contained nothing that would be at all illuminating as to the interpretation to be given to the pending pact.

On April 28, 1928, after Secretary Kellogg had received the reply of France which I have read, in a speech to the American Society of International Law at Washington, he gave an interpretation of the proposed pact, and pointed out clearly and distinctly the understandings of France and the objections of France provided the pact did not permit certain things. His remarks on that occasion were as follows:

There seem to be six major considerations which the French Government has emphasized in its correspondence and in its draft treaty, namely, that the treaty must not (1) impair the right of legitimate self-defense; (2) violate the covenant of the League of Nations; (3) violate the treaties of Locarno; (4) violate certain unspecified treaties guaranteeing neutrality; (5) bind the parties in respect of a state breaking the treaty; (6) come into effect until accepted by all or substantially all of the powers of the world. The views of the United States on these six points are as follows:

(1) Self-defense: There is nothing in the American draft of an antiwar treaty which restricts or impairs in any way the right of self-defense. That right is inherent in every sovereign state and is implicit in every treaty. Every nation is free at all times and regardless of treaty provisions to defend its territory from attack or invasion, and it alone is competent to decide whether circumstances require recourse to war in self-defense. If it has a good case, the world will applaud and not condemn its action. Express recognition by treaty of this inalienable right, however, gives rise to the same difficulty encountered in any effort to define aggression. It is the identical question approached from the other side. Inasmuch as no treaty provision can add to the natural right of self-defense, it is not in the interest of peace that a treaty should stipulate a juristic conception of self-defense, since it is far too easy for the unscrupulous to mold events to accord with an agreed definition.

(2) The league convenant: The covenant imposes no affirmative primary obligation to go to war. The obligation, if any, is secondary and attaches only when deliberately accepted by a state. Article 10 of the covenant has, for example, been interpreted by a resolution submitted to the fourth assembly, but not formally adopted owing to one adverse vote, to mean that "it is for the constitutional authorities of each member to decide, in reference to the obligation of preserving the independence and the integrity of the territory of members, in what degree the member is bound to assure the execution of this obligation by employment of its military forces." There is, in my opinion, no necessary inconsistency between the covenant and the idea of an unqualified renunciation of war. The covenant can, it is true, be construed as authorizing war in certain circumstances, but it is an authorization and not a positive requirement.

(3) The treaties of Locarno: If the parties to the treaties of Locarno are under any positive obligation to go to war, such obligation certainly would not attach until one of the parties has resorted to war in violation of its solemn pledges thereunder. It is therefore obvious that if all the parties to the Locarno treaties become parties to the multilateral antiwar treaty proposed by the United States, there would be a double assurance that the Locarno treaties would not be violated by recourse to arms. In such event it would follow that resort to war by any state in violation of the Locarno treaties would also be a breach of the multilateral antiwar treaty, and the other parties to the antiwar treaty would thus as a matter of law be automatically released from their obligations thereunder and free to fulfill their Locarno commitments. The United States is entirely willing that all parties to the Locarno treaties should become parties to its proposed antiwar treaty either through signature in the first instance or by immediate accession to the treaty as soon as it comes into force in the manner provided in article 3 of the American draft, and it will offer no objection when and if such a suggestion is made.

(4) Treaties of neutrality: The United States is not informed as to the precise treaties which France has in mind and can not, therefore, discuss their provisions. It is not unreasonable to suppose, however, that the relations between France and the states whose neutrality she has guaranteed are sufficiently close and intimate to make it possible for France to persuade such states to adhere seasonably to the antiwar treaty proposed by the United States. If this were done no party to the antiwar treaty could attack the neutralized states without violating the treaty and thereby automatically freeing France and the other powers in respect of the treaty-breaking state from the obligations of the antiwar treaty. If the neutralized states were attacked by a state not a party to the antiwar treaty, the latter treaty would of course have no bearing and France would be as free to act under the treaties guaranteeing neutrality as if she were not a party to the antiwar treaty. It is difficult to perceive, therefore, how treaties guaranteeing neutrality can be regarded as necessarily preventing the conclusion by France or any other power of a multilateral treaty for the renunciation of war.

(5) Relations with a treaty-breaking state: As I have already pointed out, there can be no question as a matter of law that violation of a multilateral antiwar treaty through resort to war by one party thereto would automatically release the other parties from their obligations to the treaty-breaking state. Any express recognition of this principle of law is wholly unnecessary.

In this reply of Secretary Kellogg he discusses the objections, reservations, and interpretations desired by France in regard to self-defense. In the reply he says:

There is nothing in the American draft of an antiwar treaty which restricts or impairs in any way the right of self-defense.

That is unlimited. Further, he said:

That right is inherent in every sovereign State and is implicit in every treaty.

That makes it unlimited in every respect. But he has another statement:

Every nation is free at all times and regardless of treaty provisions to defend its territory from attack or invasion and it alone is competent to decide whether circumstances require recourse to war in self-defense.

To some minds it has been thought that naming the territory restricts or eliminates the broader definition of self-defense as an inherent and inalienable right, broad as words and as limitless as can be. I take a different view. I think this is simply an illustration, and that a minor illustration can not repeal or abolish the general term relating to self-defense. But I will allude to that later. Even that idea disappears later.

Now as to the league covenant. Secretary Kellogg dissipates all doubt as to that. Let it be understood that the covenant of the league would not be interfered with by this pact. That is covered in the second part of his statement.

Third, he refers to the Locarno treaties, the ultimate aim of which was to insure peace in the western part of Europe, and also Poland and other countries. The argument showed that he considered these not to be contrary to the pact. The treaties of neutrality are also discussed in the same spirit.

Then, fifth, he discussed the relations of a treaty-breaking State, showing that the contention of France was absolutely right that any nation that broke the treaty had no right to claim its protection.

After this speech, and negotiations being conducted and proposals made pro and con, on June 23, 1928, to bring the matter to a definite conclusion, to ascertain whether we would or would not have a peace pact, Secretary Kellogg addressed to the various governments which were to be the original signatories to the multilateral treaty a copy of this speech, which was to be considered by them in connection with the pact, which at that time he proposed to send to them, thus stating that this was the official interpretation of his Government regarding this pact or treaty, and asking them to reply directly whether they would consent to the new pact he submitted.

The only difference between the new pact he submitted and the older one was in the preamble. In the preamble of the subsequent pact he provided that a nation breaking the treaty would be deprived of its protection.

On May 19, with the French pact before it for consideration, and the Kellogg speech of interpretation before it, the British Government made a reply to the proposal of Mr. Kellogg for acceptance of his pact. I shall quote parts of this reply as it affects the interpretation given to the pending pact:

> After studying the wording of Article I of the United States draft, His Majesty's Government do not think that its terms exclude action which a state may be forced to make in self-defense. Mr. Kellogg has made it clear in the speech to which I have referred above that he regards the right of self-defense as inalienable, and His Majesty's Government are disposed to think that on this question no addition to the text is necessary.

What does that mean? Considering the speech of Secretary Kellogg on the 28th of April, transmitted as an official document, as an official interpretation, the British Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs says his Government understands that there is an inherent right of self-defense, without limitation, without equivocation, and not limited to territory. What can be more clear, what can be more specific, what can be more positive than that interpretation? I wish to say in this connection that I have yet to hear of a foreign government that puts any limitation on the right of self-defense. That suggestion has been made only by some Senators in this body.

> If it is agreed that this is the principle which will apply in the case of this particular treaty. His Majesty's Government are satisfied and will not ask for the insertion of any amendment.
> Means can no doubt be found without difficulty of placing this understanding on record in some appropriate manner so that it may have equal value with the terms of the treaty itself.

The means adopted was the exchange of notes by the various governments. I wish to refer in this connection to their interpretations of the speech and note of Secretary Kellogg in which he set forth the principle of the right of self-defense without limitation and without restriction, and in which he said the question of self-defense would be for each nation to decide for itself. In this respect our rights are preserved by the same exchange of notes as is done by other governments in which they preserved their rights in their respective notes. Mr. Chamberlain said there was no necessity to have a reservation and no necessity to have amendments to preserve the right of self-defense and he waived any right of an amendment, being satisfied in this matter on the interpretation given by him to the speech of Secretary Kellogg transmitted as an official document. When Great Britain and all other nations are satisfied that the principle of self-defense is fully and completely contained in the note of our Secretary of State, I can see no reason why the United States should not be satisfied as that principle was communicated in the exchange of notes as official documents.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. SWANSON. I yield.

Mr. KING. Does the Senator think that without the notes the right of self-defense is preserved in the treaty itself?

Mr. SWANSON. I do; but I want to say that they went further than that. While it was implied, yet to have no doubt or equivocation about it they interpreted the official communication of our Secretary of State transmitting that speech as making it clear and specific and without implication.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. SWANSON. I do.

Mr. McLEAN. The Senator, of course, is aware that Mr. Briand in his reply——

Mr. SWANSON. I will reach that question in a few moments and when I get to it the Senator can ask me his question. I will come to the reply of Mr. Briand in a moment and will discuss it. I am now discussing Mr. Chamberlain's reply. If the Senator intends to say that Mr. Chamberlain's reply does not retain the right of absolute and unlimited self-defense, I should be glad to comment on that at this time. But why talk about the Briand letter when we are discussing Mr. Chamberlain's letter? I will get to the Briand letter a little later.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. Chamberlain's reply does a great deal more than that.

Mr. SWANSON. He did not reply any further on the matter of self-defense.

Mr. McLEAN. He reserves the right to do anything he cares to do.

Mr. SWANSON. I will get to that in due time. There is no use diverting me from this specific argument.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. SWANSON. I yield.

Mr. REED of Missouri. I beg to suggest that we at least ought to be able to discuss this article of perpetual peace in a peaceful way. [Laughter.]

Mr. SWANSON. I will do so if the Senator from Missouri will restrain himself. The only difficulty that may arise from discussing it in a peaceful way will emanate from the Senator from Missouri himself. I am glad he is apparently in a peaceful state of mind this morning.

Mr. REED of Missouri. If I am the only belligerent in this case, then when I pass from the world the earth will have peace, and the genial influence of the Senator from Virginia will look after all the future.

Mr. SWANSON. Oh, no, Mr. President. The Senator is disposed to be very belligerent. He preaches peace in discussion, but he is very vigorous in his blows, and he knows it.

I am discussing Chamberlain now and not somebody else. I will get to the others later. I ask anybody to read Chamberlain's reply and say that he does not understand completely that the letter transmitted by our Secretary of State with his speech reserves the right of complete self-defense. Mr. Chamberlain's letter goes further and reserves the Locarno treaty, making it conditional on the covenant of the League of Nations and neutrality treaties as well, and he brings in article 10, which has been read, in which he reserves the right to exercise his own will and his own judgment—that is, the British will and judgment—in some special affairs where they have a vital interest and which the treaty would not affect.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. SWANSON. I yield.

Mr. McLEAN. He also suggests that we have some vital interests which, for some reason or other, our Secretary of State forgot.

Mr. SWANSON. I will get to that later.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. SWANSON. In just a moment. In making that declaration, reserving the special interests for Great Britain where they have a vital interest, it was understood that the United States would, in pursuance of its traditional country's policy, insist that it had special interests in certain territories that it would not waive. I yield now to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator from Connecticut said that our Secretary of State "forgot." The Secretary of State did not forget the matter at all. It was in his mind at all times, and he conserved in a manner in which he thought it was most effective.

Mr. McLEAN. I was putting the most charitable interpretation on it that I could.

Mr. SWANSON. I will ask to have inserted in my remarks, without reading, as the Senate has had it repeatedly read, the remaining portion of the reply of Mr. Chamberlain in connection with that statement.

The matter referred to is as follows:

The point is one of importance because of its bearing on the treaty engagements by which His Majesty's Government are already bound. The preservation of peace has been the chief concern of His Majesty's Government and the prime object of all their endeavors. It is the reason why they have given ungrudging support to the League of Nations and why they have undertaken the burden of the guaranty embodied in the Locarno treaty. The sole object of all these engagements is the elimination of war as an instrument of national policy, just as it is the purpose of the peace pact now proposed. It is because the object of both is the same that there is no real antagonism between the treaty engagements which His Majesty's Government have already accepted and the pact which is now proposed. The machinery of the covenant and of the treaty of Locarno, however, go somewhat further than a renunciation of war as a policy, in that they provide certain sanctions for a breach of their obligations. A clash might thus conceivably arise between the existing treaties and the proposed pact unless it is understood that the obligations of the new engagement will cease to operate in respect of a party which breaks its pledges and adopts hostile measures against one of its cocontractants.

For the Government of this country respect for the obligations arising out of the covenant of the League of Nations and out of the Locarno treaties is fundamental. Our position in this regard is identical with that of the German Government as indicated in their note of the 27th of April. His Majesty's Government could not agree to any new treaty which would weaken or undermine these engagements on which the peace of Europe rests. Indeed, public interest in this country in the scrupulous fulfillment of these engagements is so great that His Majesty's Government would for their part prefer to see some such provision as article 4 of the French draft embodied in the text of the treaty. To this, we understand, there will be no objection. Mr. Kellogg has made it clear in the speech to which I have drawn attention that he had no intention by the terms of the new treaty of preventing the parties to the covenant of the league or to the Locarno treaty from fulfilling their obligations.

The language of article 1, as to the renunciation of war as an instrument of national policy, renders it desirable that I should remind your excellency that there are certain regions of the world the welfare and integrity of which constitute a special and vital interest for our peace and safety. His Majesty's Government have been at pains to make it clear in the past that interference with these regions can not be suffered. Their protection against attack is to the British Empire a measure of self-defense. It must be clearly understood that His Majesty's Government in Great Britain accept the new treaty upon the distinct understanding that it does not prejudice their freedom of action in this respect. The Government of the United States have comparable interests, any disregard of which by a foreign power they have declared that they would regard as an unfriendly act. His Majesty's Government believe, therefore, that in defining their position they are expressing the intention and meaning of the United States Government.

Your excellency will observe that the detailed arguments in the foregoing paragraphs are expressed on behalf of His Majesty's Government in Great Britain. It will, however, be appreciated that the proposed treaty, from its very nature, is not one which concerns His Majesty's Government in Great Britain alone, but is one in which they could not undertake to participate otherwise than jointly and simultaneously with His Majesty's Governments in the Dominions and the Government of India. They have, therefore, been in communication with those Governments, and I am happy to be able to inform your excellency that as a result of the communications which have passed it has been ascertained that they are all in cordial agreement with the general principle of the proposed treaty. I feel confident, therefore, that on receipt of an invitation to participate in the conclusion of such a treaty, they, no less than His Majesty's Government in Great Britain, will be prepared to accept the invitation.

Mr. SWANSON. What I wish to emphasize as contained in the reply is, first, the right of self-defense, free and unlimited; second, that the covenant of the League of Nations and the Locarno treaties are not interfered with; third, that Great Britain has certain spheres where she has a special interest as to which she did not intend, as she thought she ought to give expression, to grant the right of interference by any government, stating that she would take it practically as an unfriendly act; fourth, she concedes that we have interests under the Monroe doctrine in which we would not tolerate any interference. Having clearly in mind what that reply contained, which I will discuss further a little later, I will proceed now to read the other notes.

It will be noted that the British Government suggested that the Dominions and self-governing colonies of the British Empire should be requested to join in the proposed multilateral treaty as it affected, not Great Britain alone, but the entire empire. This suggestion was followed and their replies were subsequently received by the Secretary of State.

On May 26, 1928, the Japanese Government replied. The pertinent portion of the reply is as follows:

The proposal of the United States is understood to contain nothing that would refuse to independent states the right of self-defense, and nothing which is incompatible with the obligations of agreements guaranteeing the public peace, such as are embodied in the covenant of the League of Nations and the treaties of Locarno. Accordingly, the Imperial Government firmly believe that unanimous agreement on a mutually acceptable text for such a treaty as is contemplated is well capable of realization by discussion between the six powers referred to, and they would be happy to collaborate with cordial good will in the discussions with the purpose of securing what they are persuaded is the common desire of all the peoples of the world, namely, the cessation of wars and the definite establishment among the nations of an era of permanent and universal peace.

Now, I want Senators to remember that the Japanese Government had before it the speech of Secretary Kellogg and his letter communicating it, in which he distinctly stated that the right of self-defense was not in any way interfered with and the Japanese Government saw no occasion for a reservation to the treaty to accomplish that purpose. There is one of the great governments of the world that is satisfied with the note and satisfied with the speech of Secretary Kellogg on the question of self-defense.

On May 30 the Government of New Zealand gave a favorable reply to the proposal.

On May 30 the Irish Government made its reply, which was in part as follows:

Sharing the view expressed by the Secretary of State of the United States in his speech before the American Society of International Law that nothing in the draft treaty is inconsistent with the covenant of the League of Nations, the Government of the Irish Free State accept unreservedly the invitation of the United States Government to become a party to the treaty jointly with the other states similarly invited.

On May 30 the Canadian Government gave its reply, which is in part as follows:

The question whether the obligations of the covenant of the league would conflict in any way with the obligations of the proposed pact has been given careful consideration. His Majesty's Government in Canada regards the league, with all its limitations, as an indispensable and continuing agency of international understanding, and would not desire to enter upon any course which would prejudice its effectiveness. It is, however, convinced that there is no conflict either in the letter or in the spirit between the covenant and the multilateral pact, or between the obligations assumed under each.

On June 2, 1928, the Commonwealth of Australia gave its favorable reply.

On June 15, 1928, the Government of the Union of South Africa sent its reply to the proposal. In this reply its acquiescence is based as follows:

(a) That it is not intended to deprive any party to the proposed treaty of any of its natural right of legitimate self-defense;

(b) That a violation of any one of the parties of any of the provisions of the proposed treaty will free the other parties from obligation to observe its terms in respect of the party committing such violation; and

(c) That provision will be made for rendering it quite clear that it is not intended that the Union of South Africa, by becoming a party to the proposed treaty, would be precluded from fulfilling as a member of the League of Nations its obligations toward the other members thereof under the provisions of the covenant of the league.

As I said, Secretary Kellogg had received these notes and had sent his note and speech. On June 23 he submitted the proposed draft, which is practically identical with the draft before the Senate to-day for ratification. The only difference between that draft and the original draft submitted, to which these replies were made, is contained in the preamble. In the preamble of the second draft is found this provision:

That any signatory power which shall hereafter seek to promote its national interests by resort to war should be denied the benefits furnished by this treaty.

That is the only difference between the second draft of the pact and the first draft of the pact. The contention of France that a nation that violates the treaty could not under any circumstances claim its protection was agreed to.

There has been something said about Secretary Kellogg not making it clear in regard to the absolute right of self-defense.

I call the attention of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN], as I said I would do when I got to this point, to this fact. On April 28, 1928, the Secretary of State in his speech did use that expression which seems to be worrying the Senator from Connecticut, as follows:

> Self-defense. There is nothing in the American draft of an antiwar treaty which restricts or impairs in any way the right of self-defense. That right is inherent in every sovereign State and is implicit in every treaty. Every nation is free at all times and regardless of treaty provisions to defend its territory from attack or invasion and it alone is competent to decide whether circumstances require recourse to war in self-defense.

Mr. McLEAN. He used the expression "defend its territory" there.

Mr. SWANSON. I am referring to his address of April 28, 1928.

Mr. McLEAN. Later, on June 23, 1928, in his definition of the right of self-defense, Mr. Kellogg insists on the right to defend its territory.

Mr. SWANSON. On June 23, in a note to a number of powers, the Secretary of State reiterated the expression contained in his address of April 28. He said:

> It believes that the right of self-defense is inherent in every sovereign State and implicit in every treaty.

If it be inherent in every sovereign State, if it is an inalienable right, nothing that Secretary Kellogg could say and nothing that I could say and nothing that anybody else could say could take away or lessen an inherent, inalienable right. If I understand the meaning of the term "inherent" and "inalienable" right, it means something that belongs and inheres to the subject.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. SWANSON. I will yield in a moment.

Mr. Kellogg goes further and says:

> No specific reference to that inalienable attribute of sovereignty is therefore necessary or desirable.

That expression is contained in his note to a number of foreign governments.

Mr. McLEAN. If the Secretary had left his definition as it has just been read by the Senator from Virginia, I would not have a criticism of the treaty, but he goes on and limits the right of self-defense in the first paragraph of his note to the various governments. In the very communication from which the Senator is reading the Secretary of State was not satisfied to let his definition alone—that the right of self-defense meant any right which a nation might choose to suggest as properly one of self-defense—but in that very first paragraph where he defines that right he limits it to the defense of territory.

Mr. SWANSON. If the Senator will permit me, the text speaks for itself. In two or three sentences he says that self-defense is an inalienable right, implicit in every treaty.

The Senator's contention is that if an illustration such as the defense of territory be used, which is one of the forms of self-defense, it eliminates the broader meaning that includes every other form of self-defense. I say it does not. I say the Secretary takes the position that self-defense is an inalienable and inherent right, implicit in every treaty, and that every other government accepted that interpretation.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. SWANSON. I do.

Mr. BORAH. In the last reference of the Secretary of State made to the subject of self-defense in his negotiations he said:

> The right of self-defense is inherent in every sovereign state and implicit in every treaty. No specific reference to that inalienable attribute of sovereignty is therefore necessary or desirable.

That is the last statement he ever made in regard to it. That was made after all other discussion had taken place.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I just read that, and stated that it was made on the 23d of June, 1928, by the Secretary of State in his note to a number of foreign governments, and was a repetition of a statement made by him in a speech on the 28th of April.

Mr. REED of Missouri. In a speech which was transmitted to foreign governments.

Mr. SWANSON. It was so transmitted, and is his final judgment and is without limitation.

Subsequently it was determined by all parties to the negotiation that in addition to permitting the self-governing members of the British Empire to be original signatories of the treaty, it was desirable that all of the nations that were parties to the various Locarno treaties should also be made original signatories, and notes were addressed to them for this purpose.

On June 23 the United States Government made a request to be informed by the various governments which were to be the original signatories to the treaty to inform it at as early a date as might be convenient whether they were willing to join with the United States and other similarly disposed governments in signing a definitive treaty for the renunciation of war in the form then transmitted. Accompanying this note was the address of Secretary Kellogg of April 28 interpreting the proposed treaty. The text of this treaty was similar to the one first transmitted by Secretary Kellogg, the only important addition to the treaty submitted being in the preamble, which contained this provision, which was not in the provisions of the first treaty submitted:

> That any signatory power which shall hereafter seek to promote its national interests by resort to war should be denied the benefits furnished by this treaty.

The French contention that the benefits of the treaty should not accrue to any government that violated it was accepted and inserted in the treaty.

On July 14, 1928, the French Government replied, giving its assent to the new proposal upon the following interpretation:

> The Government of the Republic is happy, moreover, to take note of the interpretations which the Government of the United States gives to the new treaty with a view to satisfying the various observations which had been formulated from the French point of view.

These interpretations may be summarized as follows:

> Nothing in the new treaty restrains or compromises in any manner whatsoever the right of self-defense. Each nation in this respect will always remain free to defend its territory against attack or invasion; it alone is competent to decide whether circumstances require recourse to war in self-defense.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President, the reference there is to territory again.

Mr. SWANSON. That is included. It is one illustration included in the broader term.

Mr. McLEAN. No; I think not.

Mr. SWANSON. I do not think giving one illustration, being narrower in scope, eliminates a broader construction. I evidently take a different view of the interpretation from that which the Senator from Connecticut takes.

Mr. McLEAN. Is the Senator reading from Mr. Briand's communication?

Mr. SWANSON. I am.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. Briand knew what he was about.

Mr. SWANSON. M. Briand continues:

> Secondly, none of the provisions of the new treaty is in opposition to the provisions of the covenant of the League of Nations nor with those of the Locarno treaties or the treaties of neutrality.
> Moreover, any violation of the new treaty by one of the contracting parties would automatically release the other contracting parties from their obligations to the treaty-breaking state.
> Finally, the signature which the Government of the United States has now offered to all the signatory powers of the treaties concluded at Locarno and which it is disposed to offer to all powers parties to treaties of neutrality, as well as the adherence made possible to other powers, is of a nature to give the new treaty, in as full measure as can practically be desired, the character of generality which accords with the views of the Government of the Republic.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. REED of Missouri. If I can interrupt the Senator in a peaceful way——

Mr. SWANSON. It is difficult for the Senator to do that, but I will trust him this time.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Very well. The suspicion the Senator entertains of me is probably not equaled by the suspicion that any foreign government has of any other government, but if we can not discuss peaceful measures in a peaceful way, I do not know what would happen if we met on the open field where we were in a conflict. I will simply ask the question to get the Senator's view of record in the Senate; I do not care to debate it now, and I may never care to do so. When the French Government states, "We interpret this treaty to mean that a country is always free to defend its territory," and further says the right of self-defense is inalienable, is it the Senator's view that words "to defend its territory" are not a limitation by the French Government of its understanding of the scope of self-defense?

Mr. SWANSON. I do not think so, because it says:

Nothing in the new treaty restrains or comprises in any manner whatsoever the right of self-defense.

It does not limit it to the right to defend territory merely; that is simply an illustration of a specific case of self-defense, and does not eliminate all other forms of self-defense.

Mr. McLEAN. O Mr. President, if the Senator will read the next line I think he will have a different impression. It is as follows:

Each nation in this respect will always remain free to defend its territory.

Mr. SWANSON. It does not say "in no other respect." The Senator from Connecticut would read it as if it said "in this and no other respect."

Mr. McLEAN. In respect of self-defense.

Mr. SWANSON. "In this and no other respect," the Senator reads it.

Mr. McLEAN. Oh, no.

Mr. SWANSON. That inference is not there.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Mr. President, this ought not to be a matter of trying to sustain a position, but it ought to be an effort to ascertain the danger point of this treaty if any there be. I hardly think the Senator will say that there is no significance in the fact that the French Government not only once but I think two or three times—I have not the document before me—stated that the right to defend territory is reserved; that is, to defend the property, the territories of a country.

If the French Government had meant to give the interpretation of the treaty a broader scope, to include the right to defend the interest of the nation anywhere and at all times, naturally it would have so stated instead of limiting it to the defense of territory; it would have adopted another method and would have said, "the right of self-defense is implicit and inherent and is not affected."

I say to the Senator—and I do not say it in a controversial spirit, but I say it in the spirit of this treaty—that the French Government can very well hereafter claim that its definition of the right of self-defense, which was communicated to all of the powers, was that that right was the right to defend territory from attack.

If the Senator from Virginia will pardon me for a moment further, between that and the British claim of self-defense, which it has asserted for centuries, there is the widest possible gulf. Great Britain has asserted the right to seize the ships of neutral states upon the high seas if those ships were carrying to Great Britain's enemy anything that was ordinarily in time of war regarded as contraband or anything which she saw fit to declare contributed to the welfare of her enemies. She applied that rule in the last war and practically declared everything to be contraband that was going to Germany or to any other country for transshipment to Germany. She did that upon the ground of self-defense. I am not at present quarreling with her, but there is a great difference between self-defense as thus construed and the term used by the French Government, "the defense of territory."

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, the best reply I can make is to quote the statement that France itself made, as follows:

Nothing in the new treaty restrains or compromises in any manner whatsoever the right of self-defense.

Then it sets forth one method of self-defense, namely, the right to defend territory. At one time it was desired to limit it to territory, but that idea was repudiated.

Now let me read what the Irish Free State says. The Irish people have a great deal of sense, they have encountered trouble of various kinds and do not desire to get into any more. Here is what that Government said when it accepted this treaty; it is its interpretation of the treaty:

As I informed you in my note of the 30th of May, the Government of the Irish Free State were prepared to accept unreservedly the draft treaty proposed by your Government on the 13th of April, holding, as they did, that neither their right of self-defense nor their commitments under the covenant of the League of Nations were in any way prejudiced by its terms.

What can be more plain than that unlimited interpretation of the Irish Free State?

On July 15, 1928, the Italian Government replied, and their reply I will ask to have inserted in my remarks at this point.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The Royal Government, which has attentively examined the last draft of a treaty for the elimination of war proposed by the United States, takes note of and agrees with the interpretation of the said treaty which the Government of the United States sets forth in the above-mentioned note of June 23 last, and on this premise declares that it is disposed to proceed to the signature thereof.

On July 16, 1928, the Canadian Government agreed to accept the treaty as changed.

On July 17, 1928, the Belgian Government replied as follows:

The text prepared by the Government of Washington commands the full approbation of the Royal Government. This Government notes with satisfaction the explanations and interpretations contained in your excellency's letter. It is pleased to note that the proposed pact will maintain unimpaired the rights and obligations arising from the covenant of the League of Nations and from the Locarno agreements which constitute for Belgium fundamental guaranties of security.

The Polish Government replied, on July 17, 1928, as follows:

The principles which Mr. Kellogg has emphasized in the draft above mentioned conforming entirely with the objectives that Poland never ceases to pursue in its foreign policy, I have the honor to communicate to you the fact that the Polish Government accepts the text of the above-stated pact and declares itself ready to affix its signature thereto.

As regards the interpretation of the pact in question which you have been good enough to give in your note of June 23, and which confirms the fact that the pact is destined to insure the consolidation of peaceful relations between states on the basis of the existing international obligations, the Polish Government takes note of the following statements:

(1) That the pact does not affect in any way the right of legitimate defense inherent in each state.

(2) That each state signatory to the pact which may endeavor to realize its national interests by means of war shall be deprived of the benefits of the said pact.

(3) That no incompatibility exists between the stipulations of the pact against war and the obligations deriving from the covenant of the League of Nations for states which are members of the latter. This statement results from the very fact that the pact proposed by Mr. Kellogg stipulates the renunciation of war as an instrument of national policy.

A clear, positive, and specific condition. Inherent and complete self-defense is its interpretation of what the note, speech and all contain.

On July 18 the British Government replied to the new proposal, as follows:

SIR: I am happy to be able to inform you that after carefully studying the note which you left with me on the 23d of June, transmitting the revised text of the draft of the proposed treaty for the renunciation of war, His Majesty's Government in Great Britain accept the proposed treaty in the form transmitted by you and will be glad to sign it at such time and place as may be indicated for the purpose by the Government of the United States.

My Government have read with interest the explanations contained in your note as to the meaning of the draft treaty, and also the comments which it contains upon the considerations advanced by other powers in the previous diplomatic correspondence.

You will remember that in my previous communication of the 19th of May I explained how important it was to my Government that the principle should be recognized that if one of the parties to this proposed treaty resorted to war in violation of its terms, the other parties should be released automatically from their obligations toward that party under the treaty. I also pointed out that respect for the obligations arising out of the covenant of the League of Nations and of the Locarno treaties was the foundation of the policy of the Government of this country, and that they could not agree to any new treaty which would weaken or undermine these engagements.

His Majesty's Government in Great Britain do not consider, after mature reflection, that the fulfillment of the obligations which they have undertaken in the covenant of the League of Nations and in the treaty of Locarno is precluded by their acceptance of the proposed treaty. They concur in the view enunciated by the German Government in their note of the 27th of April that those obligations do not contain anything which could conflict with the treaty proposed by the United States Government.

As regards the passage in my note of the 19th of May relating to certain regions of which the welfare and integrity constitute a special and vital interest for our peace and safety, I need only repeat that His Majesty's Government in Great Britain accept the new treaty upon the understanding that it does not prejudice their freedom of action in this respect.

I am entirely in accord with the views expressed by Mr. Kellogg in his speech of the 28th of April that the proposed treaty does not restrict or impair in any way the right of self-defense, as also with his opinion that each state alone is competent to decide when circumstances necessitate recourse to war for that purpose.

In the light of the foregoing explanations, His Majesty's Government in Great Britain are glad to join with the United States and with all other governments similarly disposed in signing a definitive treaty for the renunciation of war in the form transmitted in your note of the 23d of June. They rejoice to be associated with the Government of the United States of America and the other parties to the proposed treaty in a further and signal advance in the outlawry of war.

On July 18, 1928, the Governments of India and Australia gave their assent to the new draft.

On the same day the Government of New Zealand gave its assent to the new draft.

On July 18, 1928, the Union of South Africa gave its consent in the following terms:

On behalf of His Majesty's Government in the Union of South Africa I have the honor to inform you that my Government have given their most serious consideration to the new draft treaty for the renunciation of war, submitted in your note of 23d of June, and to the observations accompanying it.

My Government note with great satisfaction (a) that it is common cause that the right of legitimate self-defense is not affected by the terms of the new draft; (b) that, according to the preamble, any signatory who shall seek to promote its national interests by resort to war shall forfeit the benefits of the treaty; and (c) that the treaty is open to accession by all powers of the world.

My Government have further examined the question whether the provisions of the present draft are inconsistent with the terms of the covenant of the League of Nations by which they are bound, and have come to the conclusion that this is not the case, and that the objects which the League of Nations was constituted to serve can but be promoted by members of the League of Nations participating in the proposed treaty.

On July 20, 1928, the Czechoslovakian Government gave its consent.

On July 20, 1928, the Japanese Government approved the new draft and expressed its willingness to sign it. In its letter transmitting its acceptance it used this expression:

You proceed to reenforce in detail the explanations made by the Secretary of State in his speech of the 28th of April, 1928.

On the 27th day of August last the different governments who were to be the original signatories to the treaty attached their signatures without further exchange of official documents or speech.

Mr. President, with all of these communications before it, with all of these understandings and exchanges of notes—and I have read the substance of all of them that were exchanged prior to the 27th of August, when it was signed—the treaty was signed by these nations without further exchange of notes or official documents or speeches. I contend that at that time the status of the treaty was fixed. Any amendments, changes, or suggestions, subsequently made, to the effective, must be concurred in by all other nations. The treaty was then fixed in its interpretations, in its language, its draft, and notes.

Now, Mr. President, I will try to discuss what this discloses.

The first question presented to us for consideration is: Do these official documents, official interpretations, and official reservations constitute a part of the treaty, or is the treaty to be construed only by the language used in the treaty?

Some advocates of the treaty insist that all these official documents, official interpretations, and official reservations and conditions do not constitute a part of the treaty, asserting that they are extraneous, and should not be considered in giving a proper interpretation of the treaty. I can not agree with any such contention. The universal rule in interpreting such documents is to consider all the transactions that occurred and the understandings arrived at before the signatures were attached, and there is no excuse in this case to deviate from this well-established rule. Besides, it would be a gross breach of good faith to ignore the interpretations given to the treaty by our Secretary of State, whether in his open declarations or his silent acquiescence in the interpretations given by other governments. To obtain the consent of a nation to the treaty with official interpretations of it, and then permit the nation to attach its signature upon expressed conditions, and then repudiate these, would be such bad faith on the part of this Government as to bring it into great disrepute. This Government, noted for its fair and frank dealings, which it has scrupulously observed in all its diplomatic relations, will never consent to a transaction so reprehensible. It would be better for this treaty to be defeated than for this Government to have its honor and reputation so stained.

Thus, Mr. President, we are compelled to interpret this treaty by giving full import to all the official communications, interpretations, reservations, and conditions insisted upon by the various governments when their signatures were attached. Secretary Kellogg insists that the treaty would have had the same construction and effect if there had been no exchange of notes. The interpretations and reservations contained in the notes only made more clear and specific the proper interpretation of the treaty. There can be no special reservations or interpretations for one nation that do not accrue to all. The treaty must be uniform to all who were the original signatories; and all that occurred and all the understandings arrived at prior to the signatures must be considered in interpretating the treaty and belong to all these nations alike.

Mr. President, bearing all this in mind, we will now proceed in a just and fair way to ascertain the meaning of this treaty and what it will accomplish toward the prevention of war. We will first determine what wars are permissible under this treaty.

The Secretary of State, in his speech of April 28, 1928, which was communicated to all the governments concerned as his interpretation of the pact, stated:

There is nothing in the American draft of an antiwar treaty which restricts or impairs in any way the right of self-defense.

Also, in the body of the note of June 23, transmitting the speech of April 28, and the proposed draft of the treaty to the various governments, the Secretary of State said, speaking for the United States Government:

It believes the right of self-defense is inherent in every sovereign state and implicit in every treaty. No specific reference to that inalienable attribute of sovereignty is therefore necessary or desirable.

This interpretation was concurred in by every nation in official communications to our Secretary of State.

In the same speech the Secretary of State, in speaking of the power of any government to exercise its inalienable right of self-defense, stated:

It alone is competent to decide whether circumstances require recourse to war in self-defense.

This interpretation was concurred in by all signatories of the treaty.

Thus, it is universally acknowledged that all wars of self-defense are excluded from the operation of this treaty, and every nation determines for itself the question of self-defense. It should be noted that this question of self-defense is not limited to territory, but includes anything that any nation may determine is vital for its protection and self-defense. The wars excluded from the operations of this treaty by this interpretation are as limitless as the imagination or the ambition of nations may desire. It practically excludes from the operations of this treaty almost any war that has occurred in the last century. I hardly recall a war that has occurred during this period that the governments engaged did not claim to be a war of self-defense. Every government that engaged in the World War insisted it was waged on their part for self-defense. Thus, this treaty would have been wholly ineffective in restraining any of the governments that participated in the World War. This interpretation, given by the Secretary of State and acquiesced in by all the signatories, permits governments desirous of engaging in war to be unrestrained by this treaty, because all they will have to do is to claim it is a war of self-defense, and the interpretations of the treaty make them alone the judge of this question. Its significance as a solemn peace pact by these interpretations is seriously impaired.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. SWANSON. I do.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Then, if this treaty would not have prevented the great World War, and would not have prevented any of the wars of the last 100 years, the sole benefit of the treaty must be merely that it is an expression of good will and of intent, and that is about all.

Mr. SWANSON. That is what I believe it is, to be frank with the Senator.

Mr. REED of Missouri. I believe it is, too.

Mr. SWANSON. That is all I believe it is. I believe it is an expression of a desire in your heart for peace. Whether it is genuine or not, is for you to judge and the other nations to judge.

Mr. REED of Missouri. In other words, we are to exchange a sort of international kiss.

Mr. SWANSON. Well, we had better exchange kisses than blows.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Sometimes they lead to blows.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. SWANSON. I do.

Mr. BRUCE. Does not the Senator, however, feel that some of the nations that have signed the pact have signed it with their tongues in their cheeks?

Mr. SWANSON. I do not know where there tongues were, but I know their pens have expressed what they thought about it.

Mr. BRUCE. Has the Senator read the comments of Mussolini in the Italian Parliament on the treaty?

Mr. SWANSON. I have not read his speech, but I have read the notes of the Italian Government, which are its official communications as to what it is willing to do.

Mr. BRUCE. It is true that the Italian Government has passed through the formal process of signing this treaty; but when we go a little outside of that process to ascertain precisely in what spirit the treaty was signed by Italy all the evidence, to my mind, shows that the signing was done in the most cynical and skeptical spirit, without any sort of faith in its efficacy so far as the Italian Government was concerned.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, may I say just a word here?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. SWANSON. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I do not suppose that anyone on this floor thinks that the Government of the United States was to any extent whatever insincere in negotiating or in signing this treaty or that the Senate of the United States will be insincere if it shall ratify the treaty. I have no doubt that every American citizen, with possibly very few exceptions, will concede that the United States enters into this treaty in perfectly good faith, with every purpose scrupulously to observe its conditions. If we indulge such generous sentiments concerning our own Government, it seems to me that we ought to be rather cautious about indulging suspicions that other governments are less honest and less purposeful and less sincere than our own.

My attention was called to the remark made by Premier Mussolini to which the Senator from Maryland refers; and I do not undertake to say, in view of the remark made by that distinguished official of the Italian Government, that there is not some justification for such suspicions as the Senator from Maryland may indulge.

I can not, however, think that the Government of Germany, for instance, the Government of France, or the Government of Great Britain, whose peoples I undertake to say have a hatred of war quite as acute as that entertained by our own people, are not looking for some substantial results from the solemn declaration of their governments and of the governments of the world that they do not propose hereafter to resort to war for the settlement of international controversies.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Virginia allow me for just a minute?

Mr. SWANSON. I do not like to get into a discussion about Mussolini.

Mr. BRUCE. The Senator has yielded to the Senator from Montana to reply to me, and I thought possibly he would allow me to make a rejoinder.

Mr. SWANSON. I yield to the Senator. I have detained the Senate longer than I had expected, and I should prefer not to have a discussion of Mussolini and what people have said. I have tried to discuss this treaty with the official notes given by a government in a serious official way as its interpretation of what it purported to do. Any speeches that are made subsequently in ridicule of it to my mind are not pertinent to an interpretation of this treaty, except as to the spirit in which the government concerned may have signed it. I yield to the Senator, however.

Mr. BRUCE. I had no desire to say anything further about Mussolini. I wish simply to say that I think that the Senator from Montana was quite beside the mark when he imputed to me a disposition to question the sincerity of our Government in proposing this multilateral pact. The trouble with our Government in dealing with foreign nations has always been that it is too sincere, if that can ever be, and that its sincerity is by no means always fully reciprocated by other nations when the play of diplomatic intrigue and finesse commences. The Senator will recollect that our fingers were pretty badly burned when we attempted to enter into a satisfactory naval disarmament agreement with even such a civilized and highly enlightened power as Great Britain.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I hope the Senator will not precipitate a naval debate in the midst of my remarks.

Mr. BRUCE. I simply wanted to say that I was not imputing any insincerity to our Government.

Mr. SWANSON. I am glad to give the Senator an opportunity to make his disclaimer.

Mr. BRUCE. I would not want to be put in that position for a moment.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I can not yield further.

Mr. President, the next wars that are to be excluded from the operations of this treaty are such as might arise under the covenant of the League of Nations. The Secretary of State, speaking for this Nation to all the nations that have attached their signatures to this treaty, expressly excluded from its operations all obligations that have been assumed under the covenant by all members of the League of Nations and the signatories; members of the league also specifically reserved the obligations of the league. Let us examine the covenant of the League of Nations and see what wars under its provisions are permissible and to which this treaty would not apply. In article 10 of the covenant the territorial integrity and existing political independence of all members of the league is guaranteed, and provision is made under certain conditions for the council of the league and the members of the league to take action to fulfill the obligations assumed under this section. Thus all wars for this purpose would be unaffected by the provisions of this treaty. Article 11 of the covenant provides:

> Any war or threat of war, whether immediately affecting any of the members of the league or not, is hereby declared a matter of concern to the whole league, and the league shall take any action that may be deemed wise and effectual to safeguard the peace of nations.

This opens up for the decision of the League of Nations a broad and undefined field of activity in use of force or of war as it may determine. It should be noted that this activity of the league is not confined to the members of the league, but includes all nations that are not members of the league. Thus this treaty would not prohibit the 55 nations of the world who are members of the league from having concerted action of force or war against any nation, whether a member of the league or not. All the activities of the league under article 11 of the covenant are permissible under this treaty.

Article 13 of the covenant provides that in case a member of the league fails to comply with the decision of a court or the award of a tribunal to which a matter has been referred, then the council shall propose what steps shall be taken to give effect to such judgment or award. Any war that might arise under this article would be outside the operations of this treaty.

Article 16 of the covenant provides that in case any member of the league resorts to war under articles 12, 13, or 15 of the covenant, it shall ipso facto be deemed to have committed an act of war against the other members of the league, and the members of the league undertake immediately to subject this nation to a severance of trade and financial relations, the prohibition of all intercourse between the nationals of the covenant-breaking state and the nationals of any other state, whether a member of the league or not. It further provides that it shall be the duty of the council in such cases to recommend to the several nations concerned what effective force—military, naval, and air—the members of the league shall severally contribute to the armed forces to be used to protect the covenants of the league. This section further provides that the members of the league will mutually support one another in resisting any special measure aimed at one of their number by the covenant-breaking state. Under this article of the covenant all wars which might arise under it are excluded from the operations of this treaty.

A question has arisen in case the league should declare an economic blockade against any one of its members under this article and seek to enforce it by military force, to what extent would the United States be bound to acquiesce in such action under this treaty. As all obligations of the league are excluded from the operations of this treaty the United States would be as free morally and legally to act in such case as it might see proper, precisely as if this treaty had never been entered into. Our conduct and action would be as free and untrammelled as it now is; the treaty would not affect us in this respect in any way whatsoever. Under this pact the United States assumes no moral or legal obligation whatsoever contained in any other treaty, covenant, or agreement. Its obligations are absolutely limited to this treaty.

Mr. President, the League of Nations is left unaffected by this treaty. It does not modify, restrain, or alter it in any respect. The obligations of the league are left unaffected by this treaty. Therefore the friends of the League of Nations can support this treaty without apprehension that it will in any way interfere with the league and its activities and undertakings.

Mr. President, the written agreements or the treaties of Locarno are also expressly excluded from the operations of this treaty. The first of these treaties, and the most far-reaching, signed by Germany, Belgium, France, Great Britain, and Italy guarantees the present boundaries of these countries in the west and the inviolability of the demilitarized zone in the Rhine as defined in the treaty of Versailles. The second class of these treaties are arbitration treaties between Great Britain and France, Germany and Belgium, Germany and Poland, Germany and Czechoslovakia, which if complied with would prevent war, but in case of noncompliance might result in war, which, if once started, would be far extended. There is also a treaty somewhat similar to but a little different between Poland and Czechoslovakia. The third class of these treaties consists of two guaranty treaties between France and Poland and between France and Czechoslovakia in which France agrees to give Poland and Czechoslovakia immediate assistance in the event of unprovoked aggression against them by Germany.

The ninth document is a letter sent after the signing of the treaties to the German delegation assuring Germany that the interpretation of article 16 of the covenant of the League of Nations is as follows:

> * * * the obligations resulting from the said article on the members of the league must be understood to mean that each state member of the league is bound to cooperate loyally and effectively in support of the covenant and in resistance to any act of aggression to an extent which is compatible with its military situation and takes its geographical position into account.

All of these agreements were conditioned upon the entrance of Germany into the League of Nations and were to be exercised in pursuance of the obligations of the covenant. Thus, all wars which might arise under the Locarno treaties and understandings may be considered as exclusions under the covenant of the League of Nations also, as by their terms and texture they are really made a part of the covenant. These Locarno treaties and understandings are left unaffected by this treaty. Thus, those in favor of the Locarno agreements and are hopeful of peaceful results therefrom can support this treaty and have no apprehension that these agreements are in any way interfered with by this treaty.

Mr. President, these exclusions from the operations of this treaty are clear, definite, and certain. There is nothing that can be productive of misunderstandings. The proponents of this treaty have wisely excluded from its provisions all the obligations assumed by nations in the Locarno agreements and the covenant of the League of Nations. These instrumentalities of peace are left untouched and unchanged by this treaty. The proponents of this treaty concur that these agencies of peace should not be interfered with, and such force as is permitted under them is designed for the prevention of war. I desire to congratulate the proponents of this treaty for their cordial and thorough indorsement of the League of Nations, its work, and purposes.

Mr. President, this treaty makes other exclusions of war from its provisions. In the reply of the British Government on May 10, 1928, through Mr. Chamberlain, the Foreign Secretary, to Secretary of State Kellogg, there is this language:

> The language of article 1, as to the renunciation of war as an instrument of national policy, renders it desirable that I should remind your excellency that there are certain regions of the world the welfare and integrity of which constitute a special and vital interest for our peace and safety. His Majesty's Government have been at pains to make it clear in the past that interference with these regions can not be suffered. Their protection against attack is to the British Empire a measure of self-defense. It must be clearly understood that His Majesty's Government in Great Britain accept the new treaty upon the distinct understanding that it does not prejudice their freedom of action in this respect. The Government of the United States have comparable interests any disregard of which by a foreign power they have declared that they would regard as an unfriendly act. His Majesty's Government believe, therefore, that in defining their position they are expressing the intention and meaning of the United States Government.

Thus Great Britain clearly reserves to herself certain regions of the world in which she proposes to permit no interference from anyone, and where she claims a special and vital interest and to do as her will and judgment may dictate. The British Government in its final acceptance of the treaty specifically states:

> As regards the passage in my note of the 19th May relating to certain regions of which the welfare and integrity constitute a special and vital interest for our peace and safety, I need only repeat that His Majesty's Government in Great Britain accept the new treaty upon the distinct understanding that it does not prejudice their freedom of action in this respect.

In order to justify her claim of right thus asserted by the British Government should be noted the following reference to the United States:

> The Government of the United States have comparable interests any disregard of which by a foreign power they have declared that they would regard as an unfriendly act. His Majesty's Government believe, therefore, that in defining their position they are expressing the intention and meaning of the United States Government.

Thus Great Britain asserts she understands that the United States intends to maintain the position that this treaty does not in any way affect the Monroe doctrine and which the United States expects to adhere to despite this treaty. Thus Great Britain demands for herself the Monroe doctrine applied to certain regions where she claims a vital interest, and concedes to the United States the Monroe doctrine limited to the Western Hemisphere. To this condition of signature prescribed by Great Britain Secretary Kellogg made no reply. As Great Britain signed the treaty without any reply from Secretary Kellogg, it must be assumed that he acquiesced in the contention of Great Britain and that these certain regions are excluded from the provisions of the treaty. If this is not correct, it was the duty of the Secretary of State in frankness and candor to make reply and insist on no such exclusion. Thus Great Britain would not under this treaty be prohibited from waging war in those regions of the world where she considers she has a vital interest. As Great Britain has interests in all parts of the world, this treaty would hardly restrain her in many conceivable cases. It is left to her decision and judgment under this understanding to determine what these interests are and where located. If this right belongs to Great Britain where she has special interests, it belongs equally to other nations. If Great Britain is unfettered and unrestrained by this treaty to wage war in China, Egypt, the Sudan, India, and Afghanistan, Italy is equally unrestrained in the Adriatic, and Italy and France are unrestrained in the Mediterranean and Africa, where they have special interests and possessions. These reservations of Great Britain are of little value and importance, since they are all included in the right of self-defense, which under the treaty is reserved to each nation, and each nation determining for itself the necessity for and the means to be used.

Mr. President, it should also be specially noted that through the open and repeated insistence of Mr. Austen Chamberlain and the silent acquiescence of Secretary Kellogg the Monroe doctrine is left unaffected by the treaty. If this treaty is ratified, the Monroe doctrine will retain its present status; after careful consideration this conclusion seems to my mind incontrovertible. The Monroe doctrine remains unaffected by this treaty—

First. Because, as just stated, the insistence of Mr. Austen Chamberlain and the acquiescence of Secretary Kellogg specifically exclude it from the operations of the treaty.

Second. The United States could preserve it and use all force necessary to do so under the plea of self-defense, the necessity of which every government determines for itself. All acts or wars of self-defense are excluded from the operations of this treaty.

Third. If any outside government should commit any act of aggression in North, Central, or South America, that nation having violated this treaty would be denied its protection and the United States under the very terms of the treaty would be relieved of all the obligations of the treaty toward that nation.

The strongest adherents of the Monroe doctrine in its most extreme form can vote for this treaty with the full assurance that the treaty leaves the doctrine undisturbed. Those who favor the Monroe doctrine being maintained as a shield of protection to all Latin America from foreign aggression and not as an excuse for interference in their domestic affairs, and the extension of the power and influence of the United States by force and war, can approve this treaty, since it proclaims sentiments of peace and good will, and its declarations condemnatory of war, if adhered to, would prevent a recurrence of deplorable transactions which have recently occurred in Central America. The treaty speaks the voice of peace but places feeble restraints on the strong arm of war. I am unwilling to defeat this treaty and silence this voice of peace, however feeble, crying out in a world wilderness of threatened war and woe. The voice may become louder and more potential through the receding years.

Mr. President, the treaty contains no sanctions for its enforcement. No obligation, moral or legal, is assumed by the signatories to use punitive measures against any nation that may violate the treaty. No possible interpretation could construe a treaty promising not to go to war into an obligation to wage war. The indirect implication would be contrary to and irreconcilable with the positive promise. The promise in the treaty is limited to the individual obligation of the signatory and contains no guaranty for any other nation. It should also be noted that the reservations or interpretations made by Secretary Kellogg for the United States are made by notes exchanged similar in method to those made by other nations, and hence no necessity exists that these should be repeated in the resolution of ratification. The treaty provides no tribunal, no instrumentalities for the settlement of international differences. These are left to be composed outside the scope of the treaty. This was one of the fatal defects of the treaty even in the form as originally proposed. International differences, if long continued, invariably fester and produce increased soreness. International tribunals of efficiency and character, inspiring confidence and acquiescence, are indispensable for their proper settlement. This treaty ignores these entirely. Mr. President, after mature consideration I have reached the conclusion that this treaty is a friendly gesture for peace, that as a peace pact it will be found ineffective and disappointing. No nation can rely upon it for protection. This is the view of President Coolidge, since in his Armistice Day speech, in which he mentions this proposed multilateral treaty, he strongly recommends an adequate Navy for national defense and the protecting of our great foreign interests and commerce. This pact has not been considered by him sufficient in its peaceful accomplishments to induce him to reduce in the least his demands for an increased Navy. His contention in this respect despite this treaty is wise and foreseeing. He apprehends the troubles and dangers which will accrue to us from deficient naval armaments. He wisely concludes it is better to trust our rights and security to naval ships than to this peaceful gesture, although concurred in by all nations. Mr. President, although this treaty is a mere gesture, yet it is a gesture of peace, not hostility; of good will and conciliation, not of irritation and defiance. While it may be powerless to prevent war, yet it legalizes no war. It permits but does not approve war. It is a noble gesture or declaration for world peace and as such I shall support it. It marks an advance for peace, not a retreat. It will be beneficial in crystallizing and in increasing the sentiments of the people of the world for peace. The only sure foundation upon which world peace can be permanently builded is the earnest wish and determination of the people for peace. This is a light, though a feeble one, which may guide some along the pathway of peace. The friends of world peace must realize that in securing this pact while they have made some advance, yet they have hardly begun the long journey which they have undertaken to abolish war as a means of the settlement of international difference. The Senate would not be justified in rejecting this treaty negotiated by our Government. We would be misunderstood and misrepresented in the world as possessed of imperialistic aims and warlike purposes. We should willingly permit our Government to make to the world this noble gesture of peace and friendliness.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Seventy-four Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President, ordinarily I think too much of my time, however valueless it may be, to consume it fighting what is said to be a lost cause. Six weeks ago I expected to vote for this treaty without comment, but I have changed my mind, and as a member of the Committee on Foreign Relations I want to put into the RECORD a few of the reasons why I can not vote for it, unless the Senate, by resolution or otherwise, makes it clear that its views with regard to the right of self-defense coincide with those of the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations.

After listening to his very able presentation of what he conceives to be the purpose of this treaty, I would look for peace in the only place where he and I agree it can be found with certainty. If I could have my way, I would send both the treaty and the cruiser bill back to their respective committees. I would then adopt a resolution requesting the President to call a conference to be composed of the signatory powers to this treaty for the sole purpose of reducing navies to reasonable domestic peace requirements. At the end of this conference we would know just how anxious our neighbors are for the only kind of peace worth having.

In other words, Mr. President, I think the time has arrived to stop throwing peace paper wads at the dogs of war, expecting that they will seriously injure the dogs or destroy their appetite for a more palatable diet. I think the time has arrived to pull the teeth of these dogs if their owners want to reduce their fighting propensities and possibilities. But I would not begin by pulling the teeth of our half-grown pups while other nations are enlarging their packs with full-grown specimens and are sharpening their teeth. To change the metaphor, I would tender to our foreign friends some of the peace paper currency issued by the League of Nations and the Locarno treaty and our own arbitration treaties and see whether we could get anything worth while in return.

But, Mr. President, I realize that the Senate will not do this, and so I suggest that the Senate ought to use ordinary care in its treatment of this vitally important matter, and, as far as is possible, save the generations to come from just accusations of deceit and bad faith.

I look upon this treaty as running upon all fours with the eighteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States. A few men, clothed with a little brief authority, conceived the idea that they could by operation of law make men stop wanting what they do want, just as in this treaty a few men conceived the idea that they could repeal nature's first law and destroy the acquisitive and combative instincts by signing an agreement not to fight unless they want to fight.

Mr. President, I feel that I am not only honor-bound but oath-bound to bring to this instrument freedom of criticism and conclusion unbiased by outside influences, however threatening or tempting they may be. I think that the experience we had less than 10 years ago with international peace leagues and proposals revealed to us the almost prophetic wisdom of the framers of the Constitution, when they decided that our contracts with foreign powers should have the approval of two-thirds of the Members of this body.

It is my view that the assertion or intimation that some, if not all of the powers, will withdraw their support from this treaty in the event the Senate should follow their example in their insistence upon reservations can not be well founded if they are acting in good faith, and if they are not acting in good faith, now is the time to find out. I think we ought to have confidence enough in our good will and peace-seeking neighbors to assume that they are willing to accede to us the same liberty of interpretation that they have deemed it wise to exercise in behalf of the nations they represent.

I think the American people and the rest of the world clearly should understand that this treaty attempts to do nothing more than express a mutual and sincere desire for peace; that it contains no obligation to use force or refrain from the use of force; that it does not and will not entangle or disentangle anybody or anything; but that it is the hope of all that its solemn ratification may bring the world a little closer to an intelligent understanding of the real forces and facts that make and unmake peace and good will among individuals, states, and races. If, as is asserted by Mr. Kellogg, this is precisely what its sponsors claim for it and all they claim for it; if, as they say and he says, it is nothing more than a good-will gesture, solemnly affirmed, what earthly or heavenly objection can there be to a formal expression by the United States Senate that will protect future generations from any misunderstandings with regard to the matter?

I can not account for the inordinate desire for haste evidenced by the friends of the treaty. All of the powers capable of starting a war worth mentioning are members of the League of Nations and the Locarno treaty, and most of them have agreed to arbitrate all of their disputes with us that can properly be settled by peaceful methods; so we find all the powers that we need fear, or that are afraid of each other, already thrice bound by paper promises to keep the peace. These promises, now solemnly signed, sealed, and delivered, carry with them ways and means for their interpretation and performance. Why, then, this anxiety to get us to sign a fourth promise, if it is nothing but a gesture? And why should we, of all nations, be in a hurry about it? Is there any reason why France should not see in this treaty a moral obligation on our part to help her maintain the status quo, or any reason why Germany should not see in this treaty a tender of our sympathy and friendship in the event the German people should start another war in defense of the fatherland? Under the highly polished veneer of diplomacy, does this treaty do more than conceal the hope, on the part of each of the great and frightened powers, that by signing it each will be safer in its intrigues and ambitions to get an advantage over a competitor or maintain an advantage already in hand?

If we can rely upon anything as a basis for an accurate inventory and appraisal of the moral forces behind this treaty, we can rest assured that human nature in Europe and elsewhere is what it was 10 years ago. The centuries may have inclined the world to prefer mercy to cruelty, but the acquisitive and combative instincts are still at par, and forbidden fruit is as sweet and popular to-day as it was in the Garden of Genesis.

I am not an isolationist. I voted for the League of Nations and our adherence to the World Court with reservations. I realize that industrial and cultural internationalism is on the way, and I hope that our influence will help it respond to the economic and ethical necessities of an intelligent civilization. But I think we can all agree that political internationalism is entirely a different matter. I need not discuss the racial, geographical, and economic reasons why a political supersovereignty with the vast and complicated judicial, legislative, and executive machinery necessary to its existence is still among the things that dreams are made of. And it is well to bear in mind that neither peace leagues nor world courts nor modifications of international law can abolish wars or rumors of wars without the aid of an international army and navy, operated in obedience to international decrees, delivered in sealed envelopes to international generals and admirals. International wars and crimes and misdemeanors must be abolished as the domestic varieties are abolished by superior force. Mere declarations and renunciations of war, solemn declarations abolishing war and agreeing not to fight are all alike impotent provided anyone wants to fight.

The eighteenth amendment abolished the right to make or sell alcohol for beverage purposes, and yet we read in the Washington News, a journal violently supporting this treaty, that $2,000,000 worth of alcoholic beverages were bought and sold in the city of Washington on the one thousand nineteen hundred and twenty-eighth anniversary of the birth of the Prince of Peace. This deplorable fact does not argue for or against the purposes of the eighteenth amendment. It does furnish, however, a startling and conclusive illustration of the generally forgotten fact that laws and constitutional amendments and treaties are rear guards only. If they attempt to lead they will be ignored to the extent that they do not run in harmony with the public conscience, be it good or evil.

This brings me to a brief consideration of some facts which I think bear upon this treaty and which we must not ignore if we desire to avoid serious complications for those who will come after us.

In the first place, I want to remind the Senate that in so far as there is a chance for permanent peace with justice in the world to-day the credit is entirely due to the men and women who won the war which ended in November, 1918. Had they failed, imperialism by divine right would have imposed terms upon the vanquished that would have made another war inevitable, and multilateral peace treaties to-day would be religiously unpopular in ambassadorial circles. We look upon war just now as a very wicked and a very silly business, but I think we can agree that it was a very praiseworthy and serious business for the dead and maimed and their comrades who brought it to a victorious conclusion.

I have nothing against generals or prime ministers, but it was my fear at the close of the war, a fear that has been fully justified by subsequent events, that the cause for which our soldiers risked and many of them lost their all would be forgotten by the generals and others interested in accumulating glory and real estate. Deaf to our advice, blind to our example, and dumb to the purposes for which they claimed they wanted our assistance, the nations that we saved from unspeakable disaster and humiliation left considerable portions of the world's surface as unsafe for democracy as they could. I am not saying that they were greatly to blame then. The god of battle had us all in tow for many months after the war ended. I can put myself in the place of the French father and mother, bereft of sons and home, and find plenty of excuses for the treaty of Versailles when it was ratified. Nevertheless, the fact remains that the victors left the vanquished about as Rome left Carthage in the brave days of old. Our associates signed the covenant of the League of Nations, the declared purpose of which was to secure a rapid and radical reduction in the armies and navies of the great powers, and then they proceeded to increase their armies and navies. Later on, having agreed with us to reduce naval armaments of a certain type, they proceeded to strengthen their navies in other types. Having taken from Germany all of her colonial possessions and imposed reparation penalties to the limit and beyond, it was natural for our associates to want to continue that good old plan by which he shall take who has the power and he shall keep who can. It was natural, but it was wrong, and as yet we have seen no signs of repentance worth noting.

I am confident that the good men and women in America who want this treaty ratified have given but little consideration to the war-breeding conditions in the East which must be removed by the victors in the late war if paper promises to maintain peace will do more than testify to the hypocrisy of those who have signed them. In Russia we find white autocrats supplanted by red autocrats determined upon a world revolution that will destroy individual and economic liberty and substitute a political and social régime of universal poverty for the common good. When Russia finds that this sort of thing is unworkable outside of cemeteries and penitentiaries nobody knows what will happen. But, with an Army already organized consisting of five millions of gentlemen and a million or more ladies, we may hope for the best and expect the worst.

Dictatorships, varying in their badness, are regnant in Italy, Bulgaria, Rumania, Hungary, Poland, and Lithuania, and we know how these dictatorships will end if history repeats itself. We find Austria torn to pieces; Germany dismembered; and the political union of these two powers forbidden by the treaty that was to make the world safe for the doctrine of self-determination. We find La Belle France and Mother England alternately nursing and spanking their old and new war babies, as the occasion may require, quite indifferent to their parentage. [Laughter.]

In the west we find the old dispute between England and the United States as to the rights of neutrals and free cargoes upon the high seas as acute and keen as it was in 1915, before the Lusitania was sunk, and the United States Senators were demanding that our Navy drive British cruisers away from our merchant ships carrying cotton to Germany. I am calling attention to but few of the items which indicate that the kind of world peace for which it was claimed the war was fought has been forgotten or ignored by our victorious associates. In a word, anyone who cares to familiarize himself with the political, racial, and economic conditions imposed upon Europe by the treaty of Versailles must reach the conclusion that peace hallelujahs and other varieties of lip service will not prevent future wars so long as the great powers persist in sowing the seeds of war. The same motives that impelled France to want to keep what she took from Germany will justify Germany in seeking their recovery as soon as she is able. France knows this and that is why shortly after the treaty of Versailles was ratified, France proposed a military alliance with the United States and Great Britain to maintain the status quo.

This proposal was declined. Then France sent her armies into the Ruhr Valley, and when she failed to realize her purpose in doing this, France again came to us with a proposal that the two nations that had sustained peaceful relations for 150 years should promise to remain at peace, a clear indication that France might want our help for purposes other than those mentioned in the treaty. About two months ago Mr. Poincaré, Mr. Chamberlain, and Mr. Parker Gilbert agreed with Germany that the Dawes plan of reparation should be revised, and it is there and to them that we must look for adjustments and compromises that will remove existing fears and secret vows of vengeance and help Europe to maintain political and industrial good will.

If we want good will, we must pay for it in the kind of currency that will buy it.

If Mr. Briand had gone east instead of west and promised Germany that he would do his best to bring about a modification of the unbearable terms of the Versailles treaty, he might have lost his job; but he would have gone into history as a genuine friend of peace; and if France had supported him, she would have commanded the admiration of the world and regained her historic reputation as a good sport and lover of fair play. But Mr. Briand comes to us with his new pipe of peace. We suggest that it is a good time for all the braves to gather around the international wigwam and have a smoke. This they did, but, as might have been expected, they found a carload of coughs in the first puff of the self-defense mixture, and they declined the second puff until it was understood that it would not interfere with the free use of tomahawks and hatchets. [Laughter.]

The first section of the treaty is behind the event and, therefore, harmless. The second section is a thousand years ahead of the event, if it means what it says.

Disputes of every nature and origin must be settled by peaceful methods. If an enemy hits you hard enough to cause you to dispute his right to do it, you must keep your hands in your pockets. This is what the treaty says. In just three lines it outlaws nature's first law and inlaws the millennium. But, of course, it does not mean what it says. We are told that paper promises not to fight always imply the right to fight in self-defense. As history does not record a nondefensive war in the opinion of either of the combatants, this treaty seems to return the world to about where it started. Cain slew Abel in defense of his line of business, so Cain said, and the Lord promised sevenfold vengeance upon anyone who disagreed with him. We invaded Cuba in defense of the American idea in general and the Cuban people in particular. Germany invaded Belgium in defense of the Fatherland and the war-guilt probers have revealed many pertinent facts which sustain this contention.

We find about the same conglomerate of men and morals in the ranks of both sides that we did when war was the only instrument of national policy known to self-respecting States. We find socialist and individualist, deist and atheist, Moses and Darwin, marching shoulder to shoulder for God and country in the ranks of friend and enemy; and, as usual, victory goes to the heaviest artillery. This was the case only 10 years ago.

So, Mr. President, the signatory powers having made it clear that under this treaty they can fight whenever they want to, we then come to their antagonistic views as to when and under what circumstances each would have the right to want to fight.

When this treaty was considered by the Committee on Foreign Relations it was accompanied by a pamphlet containing the official communications antedating the approval of the treaty. It was claimed by some that when the treaty was signed all these preliminary discussions and reservations would be merged in the treaty, but, as there is nothing in the instrument itself that attempts to provide or designate a tribunal to inquire into or discover the guilt or innocence of the nations involved, it goes without saying that should a dispute arise every explanatory word and comment and every condition of acceptance that was reduced to writing by the official negotiators before the treaty was approved will be published, and all the extensions and all the limitations of the right of self-defense which may appear in these communications will bring acquittal or conviction as public opinion in the nations interested may decide. In the meantime, self-interest and inherited prejudices will line up other nations indirectly interested in the controversy; and, should war ensue, might will make right, as usual.

The first thing that aroused my interest in these preliminary negotiations was the extreme care with which Great Britain reserved the right to defend her "regional" interests far away from home, and the like care with which we omitted any mention of ours. We not only failed to mention them, but in the first section of our letter to the powers of date June 23, 1928, in defining the right of self-defense, we said:

> Every nation is free at all times and regardless of treaty provisions to defend its territory from attack or invasion—

And so forth.

In our arbitration treaty with France, ratified in February last, we were very careful to specify the Monroe doctrine as likely to raise questions that could not be arbitrated. This was done in all of our arbitration treaties. But, I repeat, in the multilateral treaty we not only failed to mention the Monroe doctrine, but we used language calculated to limit our right of self-defense to invasions and attacks upon our territory.

I must assume that this was done in order to secure the signatures of some of the countries in South America; and, if this assumption is correct, both ourselves and the objecting countries made a serious mistake, in my opinion. The Monroe doctrine is not easily defined, but we know it goes far beyond the mere defense of our territory. To use a few big words, it is an ethnological, anthropological, sociological, geographical fact. To use a street expression, it has been and still is "in the cards"; and these cards are dealt by forces quite beyond the control of law and treaty makers. When we secured our independence, democracy was stamped upon every rod of the Western Hemisphere, and the Monroe doctrine would have been observed to the letter if it had never been written by Mr. Adams or read aloud by Mr. Monroe; and we know that any attempt by anybody to interfere with it in the future will result as such attempts have resulted in the past. But as this doctrine has been published or proclaimed and its principles reserved in all of our peace treaties, its omission in this treaty is significant and dangerous.

On the north for a 100 years or more we have had a treaty with Great Britain, by the terms of which the Great Lakes were to remain free of competing navies; but this treaty has been nothing more than a reminder of conditions that would have obtained without it, and the reasons are racial and generic. For similar reasons, in the south we have had occasion to intervene in the past, and may have occasion to intervene in the future. Right here, let me say that this doctrine of nonintervention, so dear to some peace lovers, has no foundation in ethics. Sometimes it is very wrong; sometimes it is a plain and positive duty. It all depends. Our liberation of Cuba and our construction of the Panama Canal are major instances of our purposes toward our neighbors on the south. We want them to maintain law and order, raise their standard of living, and enjoy the highest degree of prosperity possible; and that is all we want. We know that the art of self-government is not an easy one to master. It may not be our fault or the fault of our neighbors that we and they remain in ignorance of its ultimate possibilities. It is our idea that it must be learned some time if the nations of the earth are to secure and maintain international peace with justice, and if this art can not be acquired by self-instruction it must be taught; and if we do not teach it to ourselves in the Western Hemisphere somebody else will.

We have bandits in Chicago and elsewhere. We also have corn borers, coyotes, and boll weevils; and they all present precisely the same economic and ethical problems. We do not poison the bandits, but we try to catch them; and if we succeed we shut them up, and give them three square meals a day, and try to reform them. Twice in recent years we have intervened to protect South American countries from the aggressive propensities of European powers. Several times in our history our men-of-war have found it necessary to go far from home to protect the lives and vital interests of our citizens. We may have occasion in the future to act the part of the good Samaritan and use force if necessary to suppress organized crime—errands far remote from the defense of our immediate territory, and wholly commendable.

If this treaty is ratified and the interpretative resolution is rejected in toto, our neighbors will claim that we have abandoned the Monroe doctrine; and they will point to its significant omission in our note to the signatory powers, and to the limitation of our right of self-defense to attacks upon our territory, in support of their claim. Our neighbors will insist that we have abandoned the Monroe doctrine, and foreign powers will insist that the League of Nations is to settle disputes which may arise in the Americas; and South America will be the first to regret it.

Already we are informed that an inscription is to be placed in the room where the Council of the League of Nations meets, noting the fact that the cablegram which was sent to Bolivia and Paraguay prevented war between these countries. The Swiss Government is to be applied to for permission that this inscription be placed in this room. Here we have a definite intimation of what will be expected of us if we do not remove by Senate resolution our implied abandonment of the Monroe doctrine contained in our official communication to the other powers.

I say again, if this treaty is to be a gesture and nothing more, why should the Senate hesitate to adopt a resolution that will put it in accord with this view? And if this treaty is more than a gesture, why should we hesitate to say that its obligations do not impair our right to defend our vital interests whenever and wherever they may be endangered?

Moreover, as long as the nations of Europe are afraid of each other, and have good cause to be, and are jealous and suspicious of us without cause, it is vitally important that we keep fairly prepared for any emergency that may arise. Let us not forget that in 1915, when our merchantmen were sunk and President Wilson warned Germany of the consequences that must follow a continuation of ruthless attacks upon our ships, Mr. Gerard, then located in Berlin, replied to Mr. Bryan, then Secretary of State, that Germany looked with equanimity upon our entry into the war. Do we want to persist in maintaining this humiliating and helpless condition, knowing as we all do that when the right ceases to resist evil the right will cease to exist?

For the accommodation and concealment of men with poisonous weapons and purposes the world to-day is as well adapted and not much larger than were the forests of New England when our forefathers took their muskets with them to church and to town meetings and into the field. They did this in order that they might praise God, maintain order, and hoe corn unmolested; and that is all we want to do. If we reject the interpretative resolution and fail to pass the cruiser bill, we notify the world that in the future our first line of defense will be composed of hymn books only.

When our neighbors of all colors and political creeds see fit to meet our proposals to disarm, we shall be glad to continue to lead the way.

If the great powers, having signed this solemn promise never to fight again, had added an agreement to reduce their navies in harmony with this promise, they would have exemplified a state of mind consistent with good faith and a sincere desire to avoid war. But inasmuch as their subsequent conduct indicates that their purpose in signing this scrap of paper is to encourage us to neglect our first line of defense while they strengthen their own our duty is plain.

We are already told by the nations that rule the waves that the value of this treaty will depend upon the extent to which we "backed it." Here again it is evident that it is protection and peace for the status quo that France and England want. Should Austria and Germany form a political union we would have an act of aggression forbidden by the league covenant. In this contingency should we maintain a tongue-tied neutrality, we would be denounced as slackers. Should we openly sympathize with or support in any way Germany and Austria in their desire to enjoy the self-determinatory privileges promised by President Wilson and others, a very serious situation would present itself.

Similar complications might arise should other nations in Europe, or elsewhere, desire to combine or change their boundary lines by peaceful methods forbidden by the treaty of Versailles. We would, of course, insist that this treaty imposes no obligation upon us to interfere, and we would do this if we wanted to, with or without the interpretative resolution or the assurances contained in the preliminary correspondence. But, whatever we might do, I think we must see that in the contingencies suggested we would be better off without this treaty than with it.

Should war ensue and the nations align themselves as self-interests might dictate and we should adopt a policy of watchful waiting, the combatants on both sides and all sides would tell us that our treaty was a mere "pifflebund," a "hostage to hypocrisy," a Lucy Lockett's pocket with nothing on it, nothing in it, but the binding around it. "If your treaty is without moral, legal, or physical dimensions, why did you ask us to sign it," will be the song and the sermon of the nations who want to sustain the terms of the Versailles treaty. We shall be told that we are morally bound to fish or cut bait; that the party is our party and that the boat is our boat; that they are in it upon our invitation, and that we have no right to go ashore.

We know that if conditions such as I have noted arise we shall seek the shore if circumstances will permit, in which event it will occur to the people of the United States that our peace party was ill-advised and that it would have been much better for us if we had never left the shore. In a word, we may be as unfortunate with, as without, the interpretative resolution. Nevertheless, I maintain that as a precautionary stitch, which may save nine later on, no sincere advocate of this treaty should object to it.

I want to repeat with all the emphasis I possess that the proposed treaty ignores entirely the historic principle underlying the structure of the United States, known as the Monroe doctrine. It is the first time since the American Civil War that in any proposed international treaty for world peace to which the United States has been invited, or of which the United States is a part, the Monroe doctrine has not been specifically reserved.

The first Hague conference of 1899 contained this reservation:

> Nothing contained in this convention should be construed as to require the United States of America to depart from its traditional policy of not entering upon, interfering with, or entangling itself in the political questions or internal administration of any foreign State, nor shall anything contained in the said convention be so construed as to require the relinquishment, by the United States of America, of its traditional attitude toward purely American questions.

The Second Hague Conference of 1907, creating The Hague Court of International Arbitration, preserved the Monroe doctrine reservation.

In the great battle of the covenant of the League of Nations in this Chamber the Senate, learning that the proposed covenant was silent on the Monroe doctrine, agreed to a resolution declaring it the sense of the Senate of the United States that it—> will not submit to arbitration or to inquiry any question relating to the Monroe doctrine.

Thereupon President Wilson had inserted in the covenant of the League of Nations Article XXI:

> Nothing in this covenant shall be deemed to affect the validity of international engagements such as treaties of arbitration or regional understanding like the Monroe doctrine for securing the maintenance of peace.

I am well aware that since the close of the World War and the establishment of the League of Nations a determined effort has been made to break down the Monroe doctrine and to throw it into the discard. This effort has been encouraged largely by the defenders and promoters of the League of Nations, who, directly or indirectly, have poisoned the minds of a few leaders in some Central and South American Republics with regard to it.

I think we should take nothing for granted with regard to this matter.

It is unnecessary for me to quote from the addresses of such outstanding statesmen as former Presidents Roosevelt and Taft, Secretaries Root and Hughes, and Senator Lodge, and others. In 1923, in celebration of the one hundredth anniversary of the doctrine, Senator Lodge said:

> The application of the doctrine rests with the United States, and for the security, the peace, and the well-being of the American continent and of the people of the United States is just as vital, just as essential now as when Monroe and Adams formulated it and gave it to the world.

In 1924 former Secretary Hughes said of the doctrine:

> To withdraw it would simply invite trouble by removing an established safeguard of the peace of the American continents. It is a policy which has rendered an inestimable service to the American Republics by keeping them free from the intrigues and rivalries of European powers.

At Habana, as late as February, 1928, Mr. Hughes again eloquently defended the Monroe doctrine against the charge of imperialism and dictatorship.

In conclusion, let me say that I have nothing but praise for the purposes of the American statesmen who want this treaty ratified. I have been as frank in expressing my views with regard to it as those views are sincere. The Senate always speaks the truth and nothing but the truth, but the whole truth is sometimes left unspoken by diplomats for reasons good and sufficient to the speaker.

The story leading up to this latest proclamation of the golden rule as applied to national intercourse is long and it is not new. We all know how this rule has operated as applied to individuals during a period of nearly 2,000 years, and as the greatest of States is composed of the average man and woman it is my opinion that the nation or the man or woman who looks to the treaty maker or the lawmaker for world or individual good habits will be sorely disappointed.

I do not think the hour has arrived when we should admit that our forefathers set us a bad example when they used force to preserve the only kind of peace worth having. I do not think that the hour has arrived for us to surrender or betray this kind of peace to misinformed saints or well-informed sinners. I think it is our manifest and sacred duty to keep our powder dry and in quantities sufficient to incline other nations to the belief that the universal brotherhood we all hope for will never be the portion of greed or ignorance. If the first section of the Moses resolution is adopted, I shall vote for the treaty in the hope that the signatory powers will do what we want them to do—prove their faith by their works. If they fail in this, then the treaty will bring nothing but criminations and recriminations and imputations of perfidy and bad faith. It is to avoid accusations of just this sort against my country that I urge the Senate to use ordinary care in its decision with regard to this all-important matter.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I understand that there is no one else who wishes to speak on the treaty this afternoon and the Senator from Kansas desires an executive session behind closed doors.

COUNTING OF THE ELECTORAL VOTE

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, as in legislative session, on behalf of the Committee on Privileges and Elections I am authorized to report favorably without amendment Senate Concurrent Resolution 28, which I submitted on Thursday, relating to the election of President and Vice President of the United States. I ask unanimous consent that it may be considered by the Senate at this time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will read the concurrent resolution.

The concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 28) was read, as follows:

> Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the two Houses of Congress shall assemble in the Hall of the House of Representatives on Wednesday, the 13th day of February, 1929, at 1 o'clock p. m., pursuant to the requirements of the Constitution and laws relating to the election of President and Vice President of the United States, and the President of the Senate shall be their presiding officer; that two tellers shall be previously appointed by the President of the Senate on the part of the Senate and two by the Speaker on the part of the House of Representatives, to whom shall be handed as they are opened by the President of the Senate all the certificates and papers purporting to be certificates of the electoral votes, which certificates and papers shall be opened, presented, and acted upon in the alphabetical order of the States, beginning with the letter A; and said tellers, having then read the same in the presence and hearing of the two Houses, shall make a list of the votes as they shall appear from the said certificates; and the votes having been ascertained and counted in the manner and according to the rules by law provided, the result of the same shall be delivered to the President of the Senate, who shall thereupon announce the state of the vote, which announcement shall be deemed a sufficient declaration of the persons, if any, elected President and Vice President of the United States, and, together with a list of the votes, be entered on the Journals of the two Houses.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Is the resolution in the usual form?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. It is, I may say to the Senator.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I have no objection to its consideration.

The concurrent resolution was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to.

REPORT OF S. PARKER GILBERT ON REPARATIONS

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I ask leave to have printed in the RECORD an interesting discussion of the report on reparations by Mr. S. Parker Gilbert, contained in the Washington Post of yesterday.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MR. GILBERT'S BOOMERANG

The rosy report of German economic conditions made by S. Parker Gilbert, agent general for reparations, is having the effect of several boomerangs. German public opinion is furious, charging that Mr. Gilbert is deliberately exaggerating German prosperity so that the Allies can fasten upon her enormous reparation claims. French public opinion is delighted with the assurance that Germany can pay reparations at the present rate of $600,000,000 a year. Therefore France is expected to make very stiff demands upon Germany as the price of consenting to a scheme for "commercializing" the reparation debt. British opinion is confused, part of it rejoicing in the prospect of obtaining heavy payments indefinitely from Germany and the other part looking dubiously upon the prospect of a scaling down of Britain's debt to the United States.

Apparently Mr. Gilbert's report was designed partly to convince prospective American investors in German bonds that Germany is solvent and prosperous. But if this was the object, Mr. Gilbert may have overplayed his hand by encouraging the allied powers to increase their demands upon Germany and correspondingly discouraging the movement in Germany to commercialize the reparation account. The Germans are anxious to get the Allies out of the Rhineland, but the military occupation is no longer looked upon as a menace, and the recent outbursts of President Hindenburg and Chancellor Mueller were not taken seriously. Germany can afford to drive a hard bargain in the forthcoming meeting of the experts, because of the saving clause in the Dawes agreement which provides that Germany's "capacity to pay" shall always be taken into account. If Mr. Gilbert is mistaken in his report of German capacity to pay, Germany may be better off under the present arrangement than under a commercialization agreement.

Mr. Gilbert now comes to the United States, to find the conditions unpropitious for floating a big German loan. German bonds already held by Americans are sagging, and investors have not failed to note Mr. Gilbert's statement that the German States are extravagant and are drawing too heavily upon the resources of the reich. It is noted also that German authorities are laying stress upon the disordered condition of the railroads, which will hardly prove to be an incentive to heavy American investment in German railroad bonds. Americans are making too much money in the home market, in any event, to bother with foreign investments at this time.

Thus, with growing disagreement abroad as to Germany's economic condition, and with Americans immersed in profitable operations at home, the carefully prepared scheme to "liquidate the war" at American expense does not seem so promising as it did a few weeks ago, when Messrs. Briand, Churchill, Stresemann, and Gilbert agreed with international bankers that the time was nearly ripe for making another ingenious attack upon the American pocketbook.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

SATURDAY, January 5, 1929

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

We praise Thee, O Father of Mercies, that the mind of a great God is on the affairs of human life. We beseech Thee that Thou wouldst resolve all discords into flawless harmony. Subdue the rebellious wills and lives of men. Life's greatest values shall be realized when self is lost in great devotion to all the people of the country. Be unto all of us, O God, more than a clause in a creed; bless us with a personal relationship that shall assure us that Thou art all-loving and all-wise as well as almighty. Save us from ourselves and do not allow the treasures of our natures to go down. Do Thou separate our sins from us as far as the east is from the west, and thanksgiving and praise be unto Thy holy name forever and ever. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

The message also announced that the Senate insists upon its amendments to the bill (H. W. C. ADAMSON

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for three minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to address the House for three minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, on the 3d day of January, in the city of New York, the Hon. W. C. Adamson of Georgia, passed away. He had recently been a member of the Customs Court in New York, and formerly, for 20 years, an honored Member of this House.

When I came to Congress, little more than a boy, I took membership on the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee, of which Judge Adamson was chairman. He was to me always kind and considerate. Under his leadership, I think the committee reached as high a peak in the estimation of the House and the estimation of the country as it has ever reached.

Of all the great statesmen the great State of Georgia has ever sent to the Congress of the United States, none in my opinion was higher in character, honor, and ability than was Judge Adamson. His remains passed through this city this morning en route to his home in Carrollton, Ga.

He was one of the foremost statesmen of Georgia, one of the most efficient leaders and capable chairmen. He was a great and good man, a statesman of the old school and of the highest honor.

FIRST DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the first deficiency bill, H. R. 15848. And, pending that motion, I would like to ask the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] if we can agree upon time for general debate.

Mr. BYRNS. I would say that I have two requests on this side, and that we can get through in two and a half hours.

Mr. ANTHONY. It was thought the other day that we would devote this day to general debate. Would not four hours be sufficient for Saturday?

Mr. BYRNS. I will agree as far as I am concerned, and, if necessary, I will relieve the House of some of my remarks.

Mr. ANTHONY. And we will consider the bill under the 5-minute rule after to-day.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas moves that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the first deficiency bill, and, pending that, asks unanimous consent that the time for general debate be limited to four hours, one-half to be controlled by himself and one-half by the gentleman from Tennesee [Mr. BYRNS]. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The motion of Mr. ANTHONY was then agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. LEHLBACH in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill, of which the Clerk will read the title.

The Clerk read the title, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 15848) making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in certain appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929, and prior fiscal years, to provide urgent supplemental appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929, and for other purposes.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, this is the first deficiency bill presented at this session. It carries a number of items which are in the nature of emergencies, all amounting to slightly more than $84,000,000, which is $664,000 less than the Budget.

I may say at this time that every one of the bills so far reported this session from the Committee on Appropriations is under the Budget estimates.

Now, there are just two items in this bill which are important enough to mention to the House. One of them is the deficiency for the refund of taxes, and the other is the item for the deficiency in the carriage of the air mail.

In regard to the item of $75,000,000 additional proposed to the appropriation for the current year of $130,000,000 for refunds of taxes, there has been considerable discussion. Your committee has been very careful in its investigation of the situation surrounding the principal refund which is included in this item. We have consulted closely with the joint committee of the House and Senate which considered this proposed refund to the Steel Corporation. It is a refund which would attract but little attention in this House if it were not for the fact that this is one of the largest corporations in the world and that the refund carries a larger amount than is usually appropriated for that purpose, and the further fact that some gentlemen on the other side of the House have seen fit and will see fit to make it the medium of partisan political charges and discussion.

In fact, my friend on the Democratic side of the House, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER], has already gone so far as to make a speech, and he will probably make another one to-day in which he will try his sprouting wings of leadership and broadcast a great deal of political poison for the gullible voters of the country and some Republicans to swallow, unless they are placed upon their guard.

Your committee, as I have said, has inquired carefully into all the facts and circumstances of this proposed refund to the United States Steel Corporation, and we find absolutely nothing upon which to base the slightest suspicion of fraud or collusion or the violation of any law. These large refunds provided for in this bill have one effect, which has been discussed and which will be discussed to-day. They have in a measure served to materially change the relative expenditures of the Government as compared with the receipts for the current fiscal year, and my friend, Mr. GARNER, the other day, in discussing a probable deficit in the Treasury on the receipts of the current year even went so far as to charge the President of the United States with deliberate fraud and misrepresentation to this House and to the country.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. I would rather yield after I have made my statement.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. I just wanted to correct the statement which the gentleman is making now, which is not correct, and I am sure he does not care to make an incorrect statement.

Mr. ANTHONY. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Nowhere in the RECORD, either in the speech I made the other day or in the speech I made before the gentleman's committee, have I charged the President of the United States with making a misrepresentation to Congress, but I did say that the information furnished the President by the Treasury Department caused him to give misinformation to the Congress as to the surplus.

Mr. ANTHONY. I think the gentleman's language might be construed in that way, but I am glad that he meant it the way he did. What the gentleman did say in effect was that the Treasury officials or the Budget, through the President, had misrepresented the situation to Congress.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. And undoubtedly they did.

Mr. ANTHONY. I ask the House to bear with me for a moment, because I say that the President was absolutely correct in the statement that he made in his message to the House in connection with the presentation of the Budget on December 3. Everybody knows that the Budget is an immense book with thousands of pages. It has to be prepared and sent to the printer at least two weeks before the President sends it to the House, and this great volume contains his speech in regard to it, so that on November 20, when the Budget was sent to the printer containing the President's speech, every word that he said in regard to the financial situation of the Government at that time was absolutely correct. There was a balance on the right side of the ledger to the amount of $37,000,000 on November 20 in the Treasury operations for this year. I consulted with officials of the Budget Department about November 22 in connection with my work in the Committee on Appropriations to find out just what the Treasury conditions were. I was assured that we had that balance at that time on the right side of the ledger, but was told that there were several things that could happen at any time which would put us in the "red." One of them was this proposed large refund to the Steel Corporation and other corporations, which would vastly increase this item of expenditure and might put us on the wrong side of the ledger. Another one was that if pending cases in the courts were decided against the Government it could very easily throw us on the wrong side of the balance in the Treasury. One of these things has happened. The necessity for large refunds to the taxpayers has become apparent, but the President, in making his statement on December 3, was absolutely correct, and on December 5 the Chief of the Bureau of Internal Revenue approved these large refunds to the steel and other corporations, and the apparent balance was turned into a deficit. But what does this situation really amount to when we discuss the probable balance for this fiscal year? It means that no one can tell now what the situation will be on June 30. It is entirely probable that if the income of the Government goes on as it is to-day, if the same measure of prosperity prevails in industry and trade in this country, the receipts of the Treasury will be ample to take care of the expenditures of the Government this year, and we may yet have a balance on the right side of the ledger.

The principal matter involved in this return to the Steel Corporation of $15,000,000 of principal and approximately $11,000,000 of interest, is that of the consolidated return idea. The Steel Corporation is made up of the parent organization and about 195 subsidiaries. If they were compelled to make independent returns, one company would not have the right to balance its losses against the profits of another company. Our Democratic friends criticize the Treasury Department for this payment to the Steel Corporation largely made up as it is on the allowance of the principle of these consolidated returns. I want to say to these critics of the Treasury Department that if instead of criticizing Mr. Mellon and the present administration in the Treasury Department, they would criticize the Secretary of the Treasury who was responsible for the regulation which gave the Steel Corporation and other corporations the right to make consolidated returns of their subsidiaries, they would place the blame on Secretary McAdoo who first promulgated the regulation giving the Steel Corporation and these other corporations the right to make consolidated returns under date of February 4, 1918.

I would like to ask the Clerk to read the paragraphs marked in the document entitled "Regulations No. 41, Relative to the War Excess Profits Tax Imposed by the War Revenue Act Approved October 3, 1917," published by the Government Printing Office in 1918.

The Clerk read as follows:

183. ART. 77. When affiliated corporations must furnish information as to intercorporate relations: For the purpose of the excess-profits tax, every corporation will describe in its return all its intercorporate relationships with other corporations with which it is affiliated and will furnish such information in relation thereto as will enable the Commissioner of Internal Revenue to compute the amount of the tax properly due from each corporation on the basis of an equitable and lawful accounting.

184. For the purpose of this regulation, two or more corporations will be deemed to be affiliated (1) when one such corporation owns directly or controls through closely affiliated interests or by a nominee or nominees all or substantially all of the stock of the other or others, or when substantially all of the stock of two or more corporations is owned by the same individual or partnership, and both or all such corporations are engaged in the same or a closely related business; or (2) when one such corporation (a) buys from or sells to another products or services at prices above or below the current market, thus effecting an artificial distribution of profits, or (b) in any way so arranges its financial relationships with another corporation as to assign to it a disproportionate share of net income or invested capital.

185. ART. 78. When affiliated corporations may be required to make consolidated return: Whenever necessary to more equitably determine the invested capital or taxable income the Commissioner of Internal Revenue may require corporations classed as affiliated under article 77 to furnish a consolidated return of net income and invested capital. Where such consolidated return is required, it may be made by any one or more of such corporations or by all of them acting jointly; but if such affiliated corporations, when requested to file such consolidated return, neglect or refuse to do so, the Commissioner of Internal Revenue may cause an examination of the books of all such corporations to be made and a consolidated statement to be made from such examination. In cases where consolidated returns are accepted the total tax will be computed in the first instance as a unit upon the basis of the consolidated return and will be assessed upon the respective affiliated corporations in such proportions as may be agreed among them. If no such agreement is made, the tax will be assessed upon each such corporation in accordance with the net income and invested capital properly assignable to it.

Mr. ANTHONY. Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not offer the slightest criticism or the slightest imputation of irregularity in the issuance of those regulations, but I do say that if there is to be any criticism of anybody for authorizing the refund of taxes made under that principle—and it is the underlying principle in the Steel Trust settlement—the responsibility should be placed upon the people who put into effect those regulations.

Just one observation in regard to the probable effect that the allowance of these refunds will have on our operations this year. If we had followed the advice and recommendation of the gentlemen on the other side of the House who are leading in this criticism, instead of our being $37,000,000 on the wrong side of the ledger to-day we would be $200,000,000 to the bad.

If I remember correctly, when the United States Chamber of Commerce two years ago recommended that we should have a tax revision involving a reduction of $400,000,000, that was tacitly approved by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] and the other leaders on that side of the House. In the discussions which followed in the House afterwards the gentleman from Texas and other Democratic leaders offered amendments to the tax bill at that time which would have meant a reduction of taxes of hundreds of millions of dollars more than was made, which represents practically the amount by which we would have been deeper in the hole to-day if we had followed their advice and leadership.

As I stated before, under such examination as our committee was able to make—and we went very carefully into the matter, as completely as was allowed by the time at our disposal—there was not the slightest iota of evidence deduced to indicate that this refund should not be allowed.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. Certainly.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. When were these taxes levied?

Mr. ANTHONY. In 1917.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. During Mr. McAdoo's administration?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes; during Mr. McAdoo's administration; and the regulations under which the refund is claimed were put into effect in February, 1918.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. In other words, we are now called upon to clear up the record which the gentlemen on the other side represent?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes; the record made at that time.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. COLE] has just referred to the necessity of clearing up the record which the Democratic administration made. I will say to the gentleman that this particular question involves the payment of millions of dollars, including about $26,000,000 to the company to which the gentleman from Kansas referred, by way of refund of money collected under a Democratic administration and for which no claim was made for refund under a Democratic administration, because that company and many other companies availed themselves of the privileges given them under the law of waiting practically five years before they filed their applications, and they did not file them under the administration which had collected the funds.

Now, it is not my purpose to discuss any of the features of this bill under general debate. I may say that I believe I speak for the Democrats of the Committee on Appropriations when I say there is no particular objection, or any objection so far as I know, to any of the provisions of this bill except that provision which proposes to appropriate $75,000,000 for refund of taxes. The minority opposed this in the subcommittee, opposed it in the full committee, and will oppose it here on the floor of the House.

I have been a member of the subcommittees which have considered the appropriations for the refund of taxes ever since the Government has been refunding income taxes illegally and erroneously collected. Always heretofore I have acquiesced in appropriations made for that purpose, and I have raised no question as to those refunds, but I will say to the gentlemen of the House that while the Committee on Appropriations has made such investigation as was possible in the consideration of these estimates, there has been no real investigation ever made by the Appropriations Committee of these refunds except to ascertain the amounts that will be needed. When I say that I do not say it by way of criticism of the committee, because, as a matter of fact, the Appropriations Committee is not provided with the machinery, with the experts, and with the force to go into a detailed investigation of these various refunds.

The only thing that was possible for the committee to do was to ascertain from those representing the Treasury Department the amount of money that had been allowed and the amount it estimated would be needed before another appropriation bill could be passed. That is all that was done with reference to this particular appropriation, as you gentlemen will see if you will examine the hearings; and that is all that has been done with reference to previous appropriations, as you will clearly see if you will examine the hearings on those different occasions.

As I have said to you, I have always heretofore acquiesced in these estimates for refunds, but we are confronted with a different situation at this time. We have a joint committee, appointed under the law, to receive in advances of payment all settlements which exceed $75,000. That committee is provided with experts costing the Government more than $40,000 every year. Certainly it was expected—whether it is so written in the law or not—when Congress appropriated $40,000 for experts that the joint committee should do something more than merely receive these reports from the Treasury Department. It was certainly expected that the joint committee, especially with reference to these larger claims, would make some investigation so as to enable the Members of the Congress to act intelligently when they came to approve them, as you will approve them when you pass this particular appropriation.

Now, our attention has been called to the fact that the joint committee, after considerable hearings and discussion of one of the claims, to which the gentleman from Kansas has referred, involving something like $26,000,000, expressly failed to give its indorsement and approval of that particular claim, although, as has been stated on the floor of this House and in the hearings, a motion was made in that joint committee to approve it. They failed to approve it; yet you and I, as Members of Congress, are asked by our vote in passing this appropriation to approve it, nothwithstanding the fact that the committee in which that responsibility was vested, and which has been supplied with the experts to make an investigation, refused to approve it. That is one of the reasons why, as a member of the Appropriations Committee, I have refused to give my vote in support of this particular appropriation.

Now, another thing, and I shall conclude, because it is not my purpose to go into any discussion of the merits or demerits of any of these claims or into any detailed or elaborate discussion of the matter. But let me say this: There is something more involved in this than the particular claim to which the gentleman referred, large as that is.

There are other large claims pending before that joint committee, and this involves a policy as to whether or not Members of Congress, despite the fact that they have a joint committee vested with this authority and with this power, are going to approve these claims for large or small amounts that are sent up here without that investigation which should be given them. So far as I am concerned, I think there ought to be some change in the methods which are being followed with reference to the consideration of these tax-refund cases, because if you will read the hearings, consuming only, possibly, an hour or an hour and a half before the Subcommittee on Appropriations, you will find that these claims are practically passed upon by one man. Mr. Bond stated that when they were considered and reported, unless the official making the settlement was in doubt it was passed without further objection, but, of course, if he expressed a doubt it was carried before the board. So here we are in the attitude, I say, of passing these large claims without any investigation upon the part of Congress and which are settled, really, by one man. They call them settlements, but they are really compromises, and you and I know that the Treasury Department is not vested with the authority to compromise a claim which has been found correct by its duly accredited representatives. Of course, they get around that by holding their findings in abeyance. Then they make their settlement, which, of course, they say they believe—and I do not question that—to be in the best interests of the Government, and then they follow the policy of revising the findings so as to accord with the settlements or compromises which they make with these various taxpayers. So, as I say, there ought to be a change made by the legislative committee which has jurisdiction over these matters in order that Congress may have some information. But I repeat that since the joint committee, provided with the machinery for that purpose, refused to take the responsibility of approving this claim, as a Member of the House I refuse to take the responsibility of passing it and voting for it unless it is safeguarded by a proper amendment.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BYRNS. For a brief question; yes.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Is it not a fact that the act appointing the joint committee does not in express terms confer upon that committee any authority to either approve or disapprove, and is it not simply an inferential authority, if one exists?

Mr. BYRNS. That is true.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Second, is it not the fact that this committee did make the investigation which it is authorized to make, and was not that made in the manner that the law provides?

Mr. BYRNS. I assume it was. Of course, I do not know just how full or how thorough the investigation was.

Mr. DEMPSEY. And, lastly, is it not the fact that while the committee did not exceed its authority or exercise a purely inferential authority by approving, it did not disapprove.

Mr. BYRNS. That is true. It failed to take any action, and the whole point I was seeking to make is this. Whether it is written in the law or not, certainly Congress expects that the committee should do something more than merely receive these claims when it appropriates and provides $40,000 to provide experts for the purpose of considering them; and after that investigation, in the face of the fact that a motion was made in the committee to approve the claim, the joint committee refused to take the responsibility of approving or disapproving, and under those circumstances I, as a Member of Congress, knowing nothing about the subject, am not willing by my vote to tax the people of this country with $75,000,000 without further information or some safeguarding amendment.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Will the gentleman yield for a further question? If Congress intended this joint committee to either approve or disapprove or to make a report to the Congress upon the investigation which it was to make, is not Congress the one to criticize and not the joint committee and not those who are compelled to act in accordance with the law as it is enacted instead of with a law not enacted, and according to terms which we think should have been put into the law?

Mr. BYRNS. Well, the gentleman knows there were propositions made at the time to clothe the joint committee with just the authority to which the gentleman refers, but the Treasury Department objected, and the best that could be done was to secure the kind of law that we have upon the subject. I am not criticizing the joint committee. I am simply saying that we, as Members of the House, should not undertake to vote this money in the face of the fact that the joint committee after such investigation as it chose to make, with the aid of the experts provided by Congress, refused or failed to take any action whatsoever on the matter. And when we vote to appropriate this money then we undoubtedly are approving the claims in the face of their action.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Then we are to understand that the joint committee, as a matter of fact, did take affirmative action in respect of some claims and failed to take action in respect of other claims, is that true?

Mr. BYRNS. No; I do not know that the joint committee has ever taken any action with reference to any claim, but they did fail to take action on this claim, despite the fact a motion was made to approve it; and that, in itself, carries the inference that there was in the minds of the joint committee, composed of Senators and Representatives, some doubt, at least, as to whether the claim was a proper claim to be paid; and under these circumstances I repeat for the third or fourth time I am not willing to vote for this appropriation.

Mr. DEMPSEY. If the joint committee, if the gentleman please, had taken action, it would have been an isolated, single case, exceptional, and assuming an authority not conferred upon them by the law.

Mr. BYRNS. But assuming an authority which I believe that Members of the House believed they ought to and would assume when they voted $40,000 per annum out of the Treasury to give them expert assistance.

Mr. DEMPSEY. But if they wanted it they should have put it in the law and not left it to inference.

Mr. BYRNS. I do not think there can be any doubt about the purpose of the Congress in appropriating the money to which I have referred; otherwise, if we are to follow the idea of the gentleman from New York [Mr. DEMPSEY] they would need no experts. It is an entirely useless committee, unnecessary, and simply involving expense to the Government for nothing.

Mr. DEMPSEY. No; what they want, if the gentleman please, is the eye of publicity upon claims. They have that through the investigation made by the committee. It is given full publicity. Everybody knows what has been done, what the claim is, what its nature is, the reasons for its payment, and the matter is fully aired and given to the public. We have the benefit of that investigation, when the matter comes before us, to enable us and help us to decide correctly in connection with the recommendation of the Treasury.

Mr. BYRNS. Let me ask the gentleman this question: Having the power, as the gentleman suggests, to make a thorough and full investigation of the claims over $75,000 sent forward, having been provided with all the expert machinery that the committee said it needed or wished, after the committee has made an investigation, if the members of that committee who have the same responsibility that the gentleman from New York has and that I have, and a greater responsibility on account of their connection with that committee, after a motion is made to approve a particular claim, fail to approve it after such hearing and investigation, is the gentleman who has made no investigation, who has no information in regard to the matter, except that the Treasury Department has found that so much is due, willing to vote the money out of the Treasury?

Mr. GARNER of Texas and Mr. BACON rose.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Let me answer the gentleman. There was every reason and the best of reasons why the joint committee should not be clothed with the authority which the gentleman says it should have had, and that reason is this: The committee was given the power to investigate, but not given the power to report because of two things; one of them very vital to this House, to its jurisdiction, to its standing and importance in the counsels of the Nation. Shall we share with the Senate the right to originate money bills?

Mr. GARNER of Texas. No; we do not propose to do that.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Oh, yes, you do. The instant you consent that a joint committee made up partly of Members of the Senate shall join in recommendations to this House as to a matter of which the House has sole, original jurisdiction, you are depriving this House of the greatest function, the most valuable function, the function which gives it more power, more prestige, a greater standing in the Government than any other power it exercises.

Another reason for not presenting any report, and the controlling reason, was this: The House knew that the report comes from the Appropriations Committee, of which the gentleman from Tennessee is an ornament, of which he is not only the ranking minority member but a man of such standing and ability that we all pay the greatest heed to his suggestion. The instant you confer upon the joint committee the power which belongs and should belong solely and entirely to the committee of which the gentleman from Tennessee is an ornament, you are taking away from your committee the jurisdiction to which you are entitled, which you should hold and preserve as sacred not only for yourselves but for all who come after throughout the history of this country.

Mr. CRISP. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEMPSEY. I have not the floor, but I have no doubt the gentleman from Tennessee will yield.

Mr. CRISP. I would like to have the gentleman from New York cite me to any provision of the Constitution or any other law giving exclusive jurisdiction to the House of Representatives to originate appropriations.

Mr. DEMPSEY. All money bills must originate in the House.

Mr. CRISP. The gentleman is in error; it is only all revenue bills.

Mr. DEMPSEY. And all tax bills.

Mr. BYRNS. I think it is admitted, and it has been ruled a number of times that only revenue bills are required to originate in the House. It has been the custom from time immemorial for all appropriation bills to originate here.

Now, I am going to conclude, for I am taking up the time of others.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. May I make a suggestion in reply to the gentleman from New York?

Mr. BYRNS. I yield.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. The joint committee created by Congress to examine these returns has its agents and employees to make an investigation. The employees of the committee have criticized and have declined to approve this settlement paid by the Treasury Department. When we were having the hearings on the steel corporation report the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury stated that if they disapproved of this he would not pay it, although there was no law compelling him to do it. They recognized that it had some jurisdiction and had some power, whether the gentleman from New York does or not. As to the functions of this committee, he may be of the same opinion as was the gentleman from Indiana during some hearing when he said it was not worth a damn. [Laughter.]

Mr. DEMPSEY. The gentleman has made two statements. He says the Secretary of the Treasury, interpreting this statute, said that if they disapproved it he would not pay it. That is not in point here, because again and again it has been stated that the committee neither approved nor disapproved. So we are not in the position to which the gentleman refers. What he says has no pertinency, no relevancy, no bearing at all on the issue.

Now, the gentleman from Texas states the most surprising thing to me, that some employee of this committee said something. What difference does that make? This is the first time in the discussion of matters on the floor, I will venture, that any gentleman has ever accredited an employee not designated, not named, as having made a statement which should have any weight or influence in Congress in determining what its action should be.

Mr. BYRNS. Now, in closing let me say this: My good and very able friend from New York, for whom I have a great regard, personally and officially, has wholly failed to answer the question I asked a while ago. I am not going to press him for an answer, but, assuming that he is correct with reference to the joint committee, I simply want to say that if he votes for the $75,000,000 for the refund of taxes in this bill he is voting to approve the finding on the part of the Treasury that the Members of the House of Representatives on that joint committee failed to approve or disapprove.

They have money enough to run until February. What harm can there be in cutting this appropriation out of this bill and taking it up in the general deficiency appropriation bill in February, so as to enable that joint committee to function as some of us when we voted these various annual appropriations expected it to function?

Mr. BACON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS. Yes.

Mr. BACON. Was any motion made in the joint committee to disapprove of any of this?

Mr. BYRNS. I do not know. That will be explained later by some gentleman who is going to take the floor. I do not know what was done in the joint committee.

Mr. BACON. As a matter of fact no motion was made to disapprove it.

Mr. BYRNS. I am not a member of the joint committee, and I can not state what they did.

Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLIER].

Mr. COLLIER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I shall address my remarks to that part of the bill under discussion which relates to these tax refunds, and especially to the tax refund to the United States Steel Corporation. I am not going to-day to make any charges of any sinister or ulterior motives on the part of anyone. Notwithstanding the fact that my good friend from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY], whom we are all so delighted to see back in his seat [applause]; notwithstanding he has injected partisanship into this matter, I shall try to free myself, as I do in tax discussions as differentiated from tariff discussions, from partisanship. Of course, it is an old story that whenever the opposition party gets itself into difficulty, as it has in this instance, it is, according to the opposition, always because of something that happened overnight during the Democratic administration. I heard one of the great statesmen of this country during the last campaign over the radio, speaking for the opposition party, state that the farm problem had not been ever properly depicted. He then went on and described it in all its details, and said that all the trouble had been brought about overnight because of the action of some Democratic official. We are used to that sort of charge; and therefore the charge of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY] that all the trouble in this case was due to the action of a Democratic Secretary of the Treasury is not surprising.

We are confronted to-day with a concrete question which is technical in its nature. It was impossible for the Joint Committee on Internal Revenue Taxation to go into this matter as it should be done; and for that reason, let me say, in answer to the question of the gentleman from New York [Mr. BACON], there was no motion made to disapprove this settlement, because, after listening to five hours' discussion of a matter that had been going on in the Treasury Department for over 10 years, no member of that committee was able to determine whether the proposed settlement was a correct and proper one or not.

The Joint Committee on Internal Revenue Taxation, as you have already been informed, has lately been engaged in a review of the proposed refund of taxes and interest in the amount of $26,000,000 to the United States Steel Corporation. The revenue act of 1928 imposes upon the Treasury an obligation to submit to the Joint Committee on Internal Revenue Taxation all proposed refunds in excess of $75,000.

There seems to be some confusion in reference to the Joint Committee on Internal Revenue Taxation.

This committee is not a creature of the rules of the House and Senate like standing Senate and House committees, but it is a child of the statute. When the provision authorizing the creation of this committee was adopted it aroused little comment, and few realized the important work this committee would soon be called on to do.

In the minds of the Members of the House for the most part the controlling idea was that the committee might be useful in making suggestions for the simplification of administrative provisions in internal revenue laws. The prevailing thought in the Senate seemed to be that it would be an investigating committee, a kind of grievance committee that would be permanent and would take the place of the various investigating committees that from time to time had been thought necessary to be created by that body. While both the House and Senate were right in their conclusions, yet the work this committee has been doing is on a much larger and more comprehensive scale than few if any of us realized when the committee was created.

The simplification of many administrative provisions in the revenue act of 1928 testifies to the good work of the committee in this regard. This simplification was due in a large measure to the work of the splendid staff of experts employed by the committee, who were ably assisted by many noted political economists who generously gave us their time and labor without any remuneration from the Government.

The United States Steel Corporation tax case is an inheritance of the excess-profits tax. The taxes involved are for the year 1917, and there are still remaining unsettled in the Treasury over 800 cases for that year.

The delay in the settlement of nearly all of these 1917 tax cases, together with a considerably larger number of later cases, is due to the difficulty the Treasury has experienced in the administration of the provisions of the excess-profits tax in computing consolidated returns of corporations.

The crux in the administration of this tax is the determination of the amount of invested capital of the corporation, because the amount of the invested capital is the basis upon which the tax is levied. A certain percentage of profits based upon the amount of capital invested was exempt from taxation. All profits in excess of the exemption were subject to the excess profits tax.

It was comparatively easy to find the amount of capital invested in the case of an individual corporation. The difficulty lay in determining the consolidated invested capital of a parent corporation and its subsidiaries. In some instances the parent corporation would not only have a number of subsidiaries, but the subsidiaries in turn would have their subsidiaries.

The United States Steel Corporation has perhaps more important affiliations than any other corporation in the United States. There was first the parent, the United States Steel Corporation. Then the children, who were 13 in number, including such sturdy youngsters as the Carnegie interests and 12 others of almost equal importance. These 13 children had a numerous progeny consisting of their subsidiaries who were the grandchildren of the parent, the United States Steel Corporation. Nor did it begin to stop there, for these grandchildren had their offspring, and these subsidiaries were the great grandchildren of the parent, the United States Steel Corporation. A strong and lusty family consisting of parent, children, grandchildren, and great grandchildren which made a total of 195 subsidiaries with a combined capitalization of approximately $1,500,000,000.

Instead of making 195 separate tax returns, taking advantage of the revenue law permitting corporations to make a consolidated return, the United States Steel Corporation made one tax return for the entire consolidation.

In determining the method to pursue in finding the amount of consolidated invested capital the Treasury in 1919 adopted a certain regulation, which was continued in force until the Court of Claims, in an opinion rendered in the case of the United Cigar Stores, upset the Treasury regulation.

This new method of computation in the case of many corporations would result in a material difference in the amount of the consolidated invested capital of the corporation. Almost immediately upon the heels of the decision by the Court of Claims in the United Cigar Stores case, which had upset the Treasury regulation, the Board of Tax Appeals, in the Grand Rapids Dry Goods case, handed down a decision providing for another and a different method of computing the amount of invested capital of a consolidated corporation.

Let us now return to the case of the United States Steel Corporation. The first return made by the corporation was on April 16, 1918, and the final audit was made within the last few weeks. It is regrettable that it has taken over 10 years to arrive at a final settlement in this case and that there are thousands of cases almost as old as this one that are still unsettled in the Treasury.

While the delay in this case appears to be unreasonably long, yet candor and fairness compel the admission that the Treasury was confronted with many unforeseen difficulties in the adjudication of this matter. Not only did the Treasury have to deal with a gigantic corporation making one tax return for 195 subsidiaries, each of which was a huge and complex corporation in itself, but because of divergent court opinion which had upset its own regulations the Treasury was forced to unexpectedly adopt a new method of computing consolidated invested capital.

Also in a consolidation as large as the United States Steel Corporation a vast amount of clerical work was involved. Assistant Secretary Bond tells us that the documentary evidence alone was so voluminous that it would constitute several truck loads of physical matter, and that the final letter written by the Treasury to the steel corporation consisted of over 2,400 typewritten pages.

I want to be fair in the discussion of this proposed refund, and therefore, knowing the unforeseen difficulties confronting the Treasury in the adjustment of this case, I shall not criticize any official of the Treasury on account of the long delay in its final settlement. I do not charge that there is anything actually wrong or improper about the amount arrived at in the final audit. I do not charge that any sinister or improper motive actuated anyone connected with the Government who was engaged in working on this matter. I can not look into the human heart and see what is written there. I never charge nor do I intimate that a bad motive exists unless I am reasonably sure that it does.

The Treasury officials tell us that this is the best settlement that could have been made. I am unable to say whether the amount arrived at is a just and a fair one, because I do not know. Both Democratic and Republican Treasury officials have been working on this case for over 10 years. I heard less than five hours' discussion of the Government's side of the taxes involved, and it would be folly for me to say that the amount of the refund due the steel corporation is fair or unfair.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit me to interrupt him right there?

Mr. COLLIER. Certainly.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. At one time did the joint committee or any of its agents have any contact with the Treasury in regard to the settlement of this claim?

Mr. COLLIER. It had; one day and one night.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Then the committee was not in cooperation with the Treasury Department in any way in trying to ascertain the amount that should be paid?

Mr. COLLIER. Not at all. Now, in further answer to the gentleman's question in reference to that, the joint committee was notified by our staff of experts. This was a case that they would not even pass upon, because there were such unusual features in the matter, including the unusual method adopted by the Government of finding the consolidated capital in this case.

While I do not charge the Treasury with unnecessary delay in the settlement of this case or that any sinister or improper motive existed, or even that the terms as finally agreed upon between the Government and the Steel Corporation are unjust or unfair, yet I do protest against the methods employed by the Treasury Department in the final adjustment of this matter. I make this protest against the unusual methods employed by the Treasury in arriving at the consolidated invested capital of the Steel Corporation, even if the computation is correct and is for the best interests of the Government in dollars and cents, because I believe that the methods pursued, after over 10 years of consideration, are unjust and unfair both to the Government and the taxpayers of the United States.

I am willing to admit that in arriving at the method of determining the amount of consolidated capital in this case, the Treasury found itself, through, perhaps no fault of its own, in a perplexing dilemma. Its own regulations had been overruled by the decision of the Court of Claims in the United Cigar Stores case, and in the Grand Rapids Dry Goods case, the Board of Tax Appeals had set up a still different method of computing the amount of invested capital. These different methods were antagonistic and only one of them could be right.

It was important to the Government and it was important to the taxpayers of the United States to know which one of these three different methods was the proper one to pursue in the settlement not only of the Steel Corporation case but of the thousands of cases still pending in the department in which the same principle was involved.

In the dilemma in which the Treasury found itself, confronted by three different and antagonistic methods of determining the crux of the excess-profits tax, the consolidated invested capital of the corporation, what did the Treasury do?

Its own regulations had been overruled by a court of competent jurisdiction which set up a different method, which in turn had been overruled by the decision of a tribunal created by Congress to specifically pass upon just such questions. In this apparent impasse, what did the Treasury do? Which one of the methods did it pursue in arriving at the present settlement? How did the Treasury find the amount of consolidated invested capital of a corporation whose capitalization was estimated at approximately $1,500,000,000 and in which there was a dispute in the estimated amount of taxes of over $100,000,000?

Did the Treasury follow its own regulations in defiance of the decision of the Court of Claims and the opinion of the Board of Tax Appeals? No. Did the Treasury then ignore the opinion of the Court of Claims and adopt the rule laid down by the Board of Tax Appeals? No. Did the Treasury then reject the opinion of the Board of Tax Appeals and follow the decision of the Court of Claims? No. What then did the Treasury do?

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLLIER. I will.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Is there any appeal from these decisions on the part of the Government so that the Supreme Court of the United States would finally pass upon the method of computation?

Mr. COLLIER. That is what I am coming to, and that is the milk in the coconut. What did the Treasury do?

The Treasury ignored its own regulation, disregarded the decision of the Court of Claims, rejected the opinion of the Board of Tax Appeals, and after over 10 years' consideration of perhaps the most important case before the department ventured upon an unknown and uncharted sea of administrative procedure. Instead of going to the highest authority to find out which one of the three methods of computing the consolidated invested capital of a corporation was the proper one, the Treasury tried something new and unusual. The Treasury officials called into consultation the officials of the Steel Corporation.

At this consultation all the evidence and documents in the case were laid upon a bargain table. It was a case of give and take. They haggled and bargained, and bartered and traded, and receded and conceded until the tax paid by the United States Steel Corporation in 1921 had been reduced in an amount exceeding $44,000,000, together with interest amounting to $11,000,000 additional.

If the unusual methods of arriving at the consolidated invested capital of the Steel Corporation could be used as precedent in the settlement of those cases now pending in the department, as unwise and as unscientific as these methods were, they might be excused upon the idea that a fixed and definite rule of administrative procedure had been established.

But the Government of the United States is denied the privilege of even that trifling compensatory benefit, for both the Treasury and the steel corporation have expressly stipulated that neither the one nor the other would be bound by any of the methods employed in this settlement in the adjustment of any other case now pending.

It is unjust and unfair to the Government and it is unjust and unfair to the taxpayers of the United States that a settlement of this character—one that has not only been pending for over a decade but involves hundreds of millions of dollars—it is unjust and unfair, both to the Government and the taxpayers, that a final settlement should be made without the Government's adopting a fixed rule of administrative procedure. This could have been accomplished by securing from the Supreme Court, the highest court in the land, a definite, fixed method of procedure, which in the future could be used as a precedent by which pending claims could be settled.

Secretary Bond tells us it would take too long, and require too much time to take this case to the United States Supreme Court. Oh, yes; it probably would now, but the United Cigar Stores case was already in the Supreme Court. It was there awaiting a decision from that court of last resort, as to whether the Treasury regulation or the decision of the Court of Claims were correct.

A decision in that case would have settled the principle and there would then have been no need for an opinion by the Board of Tax Appeals, for the highest court in the land would have spoken.

This case was before the Supreme Court and ready for trial, but it was dismissed by the Solicitor General of the United States. Did the Solicitor General make the motion of dismissal on his own initiative? No; it was made, according to the testimony of the Treasury officials, only after he had conferred with the General Counsel of the Internal Revenue Bureau. Had the General Counsel of the Bureau of Internal Revenue permitted this case to be decided by the United States Supreme Court all doubt and uncertainty would have been at an end. Had the highest judicial tribunal in the land spoken, and placed the seal of its approval upon either the Treasury regulation or the decision of the Court of Claims, a precedent would then have been established by which the thousands of unfinished cases now in the Treasury could have been quickly brought to a speedy settlement.

But instead of this, after more than 10 years' discussion and adjustment and readjustment costing the Government thousands of dollars, a useless, conglomerated, heterogeneous arrangement was entered into by the Government and the Steel Corporation, and using the exact language of Secretary Bond, "as a result of concessions and offsetting" the original tax of $217,577,594.22 as audited by the Treasury and was paid into the Treasury by the Steel Corporation was reduced to $173,377,731.42 in the final audit of a short time ago, a reduction of over $44,000,000 together with interest amounting to $11,000,000.

The different audits of this tax made by the Treasury officials at separate intervals are interesting. There were three different audits under the Wilson administration before final settlement was made. There were then five different audits made during the Coolidge administration. I have prepared a table showing these different audits, and ask permission to insert this table in the RECORD.

I do not do this because I wish to reflect upon the honesty or integrity of anyone connected with the Treasury. This comparison is not for the purpose of intimating that any improper or sinister motive existed. I am not denouncing anybody's motives, but I am denouncing the methods of computation used in the case, and I am presenting this table as an indication of what we may expect when a haphazard, conglomerated method of computing consolidated invested capital is attempted. When all the documents are laid upon a bargain table and the haggling, bartering, trading, offsetting, and conceding begin, some one is going to get the worst of it. The shrewdest trader will always win. I do not believe that matters of such importance to both the Government and the taxpayers should be settled in any such uncertain and haphazard way.

Now I am going to try to explain this table. I do not have a blackboard here, but I wish I had. I will consider this table here all that happened in the Wilson administration and this table here all that happened during the Coolidge administration—not during the Harding administration, because this Steel Corporation tax case was lying sound asleep for nearly five years.

On April 18, during the Wilson administration, the United States Steel Corporation——

Mr. CRISP. April 18 of what year?

Mr. COLLIER. April 18, 1918. I thank the gentleman.

The United States Steel Corporation filed a return, which everyone would know was incomplete at that time, of $199,850,857.46, showing a return of that much tax which they owed.

On December 29, 1919, they filed an amended return. This is the United States Steel Corporation's own return. They filed an amended return, not an audit of the Government, of $207,041,023.17.

Then, on December 3, 1920, just about one year later, still under the Wilson administration, the audit made by the auditors in the department found the amount to be due was $213,410,520.92.

Then, about two months later, February 14, 1921, they made another audit in the Treasury Department and they found the amount of the tax to be $213,577,594.22.

Then, in 1921 the final audit was made of $217,577,594.22, which amount was paid by the United States Steel Corporation.

Now, my friends, on this side of the table [indicating] are the returns and audits to which I have referred. There are one, two, three, four, five steps, each step in favor of the Government of the United States and each step against the taxpayer, the United States Steel Corporation.

First, in 1918, there was the original return, then a year afterwards about $7,000,000 more, then about a year afterwards $6,000,000 more, then two months afterwards about $200,000 more, and then the final audit in 1921 of $217,577,594.22, which was paid, and we all forgot about the case until about three days after Christmas in 1925, five years afterwards.

Now, I will get on this side of the table. On this side of the table are the audits made during the Coolidge administration. The first audit was made on December 28, 1925, and that audit reduced the amount of the final audit under the Wilson administration from $217,577,594.22 down to $194,896,627.39.

Then about 11 months later, in 1926, on November 24, there was another audit. They reduced the tax then about $35,000, still, however, a step downwards, a step against the Government, and a step in favor of the United States Steel Corporation.

Then in December, 1927, there was a big jump downward and they found then that the Steel Corporation only owed $190,350,232.71.

Then in about two months—February 15, 1928—they found that the Steel Corporation only owed $189,197,786.86.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. BYRNS. I yield the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. COLLIER. Then came the final audit. It was made several weeks ago and that audit, the final one, was $173,377,731.73.

The increase in favor of the Government from April 18, 1918, to the final audit in 1921, through the different steps, was $17,726,736.76.

The decrease against the Government, not starting in 1921, but starting two days before 1926, as the case slept over five years—the decrease against the Government and in favor of the taxpayer from the 28th of December, 1925, to the final audit, was $44,189,826.49 and interest of $11,000,000.

Gentlemen, I repeat that I am not making this comparison for the purpose of attacking the motives of anyone. I am making this comparison to show that when we lay everything on a bargain table and depart from settled rules of procedure anything may happen and this is what you may expect.

The next case that we place on the bargain table it may be the Treasury officials will be shrewder than the officials of the corporation. I hope so for I do not think our boys had much chance with the officials of the United States Steel Corporation. It has been stated that it was a case of give and take. There is no doubt about that. The Treasury did the giving and the Steel Corporation did the taking. I am not attacking anybody's honesty. I am making this comparison to show you what we may always expect when such unwise and unscientific and unusual methods are pursued.

Mr. GIFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLLIER. I will be pleased to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. GIFFORD. Since I think the gentleman approves of section 606, since he says the Treasury Department has no ulterior motive and since he absolves the Treasury Department in general, I wish the gentleman in closing his remarks would ask this House to rise and give three cheers for the income-tax method of raising our revenue.

Mr. COLLIER. My time is exhausted.

Mr. ABERNETHY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLLIER. I yield if I have any time remaining.

Mr. ABERNETHY. This $75,000,000 that is being contested here, does not that include a number of cases in which there is no dispute?

Mr. COLLIER. The gentleman's question brings a new thought to my mind, which I hope the gentleman from Tennessee will give me time to answer.

Mr. BYRNS. I yield to the gentleman two minutes more.

Mr. COLLIER. I will say that this is only about one-third of the refunds in the bill. This refund amounts to $15,000,000 and interest of $11,000,000. I want to say that the Treasury should be criticized for permitting this matter to go along for that length of time, where we are going to lose $11,000,000 in interest. That is not a good business proposition.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLLIER. Yes.

Mr. DEMPSEY. The gentleman, I understand, has suggested that the time should be postponed for the settlement and the interest is running at 6 per cent.

Mr. COLLIER. The gentleman misunderstood me. I was not talking about a postponement, I am talking about the Treasury settling this matter in such a hodge-podge way, and discarding all business principles of procedure. I am not willing as a Member of the House to approve any such settlement made in such a haphazard way.

Mr. DEMPSEY. The gentleman states that in five hours he was fully unable to absorb that which had taken 10 years——

Mr. COLLIER. Oh, the gentleman misunderstood me; I did not know whether it was good or bad.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. What reason was assigned for dismissing the Government case in the Supreme Court?

Mr. COLLIER. I never heard any reason. [Applause.] I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks by inserting certain papers.

There was no objection.

THE THREE DIFFERENT METHODS OF COMPUTING CONSOLIDATED INVESTED CAPITAL

1. The Treasury Regulations:

The regulations (the rule having been in force since 1919) treat the transaction, in accordance with the business or accounting view, as though the parent corporation actually acquired the assets of the subsidiary, rather than the stock, and provide that there should come into consolidated invested capital the value of the tangible and intangible assets of the subsidiary at the time of the transaction, thus subjecting intangible assets of the subsidiary to the 20 per cent limitation.

2. The United Cigar Stores decision:

The Court of Claims, in the case of the United Cigar Stores Co. of America v. United States, held that there should come into consolidated invested capital the value of the stock of the subsidiary at the time acquired by the parent company. The Court of Claims agrees with the regulations in that the valuation should be at the time the stock of the subsidiary is acquired by the parent, but under this decision the limitation upon the intangibles is not applicable and apparently the limitation upon "inadmissibles" (i. e., stock of another corporation) is not applicable. In reaching its decision, the Court of Claims reasoned that since stock, a tangible asset, was acquired, the bureau was not justified in saying that tangible and intangible assets were acquired and then subjecting the intangible assets to the limitation provision prescribed in section 207.

3. The Grand Rapids Dry Goods Co. decision:

The Board of Tax Appeals, in the appeal of Grand Rapids Dry Goods Co. (June 19, 1928), differs with both the bureau and the Court of Claims as to the time the assets of the subsidiary should be valued in computing consolidated invested capital. The board holds that the subsidiary's invested capital should be computed separately under the provisions of section 207. Under this theory the cost of the stock to the parent is disregarded, and it is necessary to go back to the original incorporation of the subsidiary in order to determine the amount of cash paid in for stock, tangible property paid in for stock, intangible property paid in for stock, and its earned surplus and undivided profits accumulated between the time of its original organization and the time of the acquisition of its stock by the parent company. Briefly, the effect of this rule is that all appreciation and depreciation in the value of tangible property from the time it was paid in to the subsidiary to the time the parent acquired the subsidiary's stock, will be disregarded, and the value of the intangibles developed by the subsidiary will be disregarded. Obviously, the subsidiary's invested capital so computed would in the ordinary case be quite different from a computation based on a valuation as of the time the subsidiary's stock is acquired by the parent company. The board would trace the assets of the subsidiary back to its organization, whereas the bureau and the Court of Claims would make the valuation at the time the parent acquired the subsidiary's stock.

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. HAWLEY].

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Chairman, not long since the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] in some remarks made on the floor of the House, made several criticisms of the operations of the Treasury Department. Of course the gentleman from Texas is entitled to his opinion and others are entitled to differ from him. I propose to undertake in the short time at my disposal to state the differences I have in mind.

He called the attention of the House to certain refunds in cases of taxes where refunds justly due and payable under the law and to be paid during this fiscal year. As a result, an improper stress was laid on the refund side of the Treasury operations.

He finds that $205,000,000 would be used in refunds, but he did not say that in the same period the Treasury would collect $245,000,000 in deficiencies and back taxes.

For instance, for the fiscal years ending June 30, 1926, 1927, and 1928, refunds in the total sum of $447,918,284 were made. But back taxes and deficiencies were collected to the amount of $980,294,484—the excess of back taxes and deficiencies being $532,000,000.

So the Treasury has been as active in collecting taxes due from those who have not paid the correct amounts as it has in refunding money in settling claims which have been accumulating and came down in a large part from improper administrative methods used by the preceding Democratic administration which clogged the court with cases and which refused to accept the responsibility for their settlement. The Treasury is endeavoring to get rid of these cases because every day they are costing the Government 6 per cent interest until they are finally adjusted and paid.

The Treasury Department has a very difficult task in the settlement of many of these claims, for instance, in the one just cited. That task involves all of the difficult matters of taxation—the 1913 value, invested capital, inventory, depreciation, depletion, and obsolescence, and the Congress of the United States and the Committee on Ways and Means for years have insisted that operations of the Treasury be brought current. The present Treasury officials are endeavoring to do that. In order to determine what the 1913 value means in any case, it is necessary for the Treasury to employ a number of engineers, real estate experts, accountants, and so forth, to find out what was the probable value of a certain plant in 1913, many years ago, eight years at least, in the cases now pending. This was a matter of judgment. The engineers will differ. The Treasury engineers will fix one value, the engineers of the corporation or individual reporting will fix another value, and independent engineers will fix a third value. Which is the correct value? No one can say with mathematical accuracy. Consequently, a conclusion must be reached that is satisfactory to both sides, or the case must be sent to the courts for determination. The courts are manifestly slow in deciding cases, and all the delay that occurs in the courts is costing the United States in interest many millions of dollars. The case of the United States Steel Corporation has been cited, to which I shall refer a little later, but that is not the only large refund pending for settlement. The Supreme Court of the United States last summer decided the case of the National Insurance Co., which involved refunds to the extent of $35,000,000, much larger than the present proposed settlement with interest accrued to date of settlement added.

It is proposed now to defeat the $75,000,000 of deficiency for the payment of refunds. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] made an error of $20,000,000 in his statement the other day when he stated there would be $75,000,000 more than the original estimate. The original estimate was $150,000,000 and the present addition is to be $55,000,000, to what was formerly asked, or $205,000,000.

If the proposed increase of $75,000,000 of deficiency appropriations for payment of refunds is defeated, the Steel Co. and the life insurance company will not be affected, because the Steel Co. case is paid to-day and the life insurance companies, I think, have been paid in part, at least; but it will mean that some 50,000 taxpayers having small amounts of refunds due them—and probably needing them—will have to delay until a subsequent deficiency bill is passed, which in all orderly expectation would be at the session of Congress beginning next December. Meanwhile the Government, on all these ascertained deficiencies is paying 6 per cent interest, or $4,500,000 a year on the $75,000,000, or $12,000 a day, and that will be the burden on the revenues for the defeat of this proposed deficiency. And no good purpose would be served unless the Government intends to delay, and then to not finally pay, for sooner or later, if the Government intends to pay, it must pay, and all delay is expensive to the Government. Why, then, not pay promptly and save the Treasury what amount we can in that regard?

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes.

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. The House should be interested in knowing whether or not the amount of $75,000,000 or any part of it is really due to be refunded. Their mere conclusion to come to us would not be sufficient information for us to act upon.

Mr. HAWLEY. I will ask the gentleman to be as brief as possible in his question.

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. The gentleman states that we would be paying 6 per cent interest and that fact should be an inducement to pay, but surely we should not talk about those matters until we are assured that we owe this sum.

Mr. HAWLEY. I take this ground, and very frankly, and I think it is the right one in view of the facts and the certainties of the case. The Treasury Department at first took the view that with the Board of Tax Appeals, which was organized in 1924, we could meet the situations that have arisen. The Board of Tax Appeals has made some progress in reducing the number of cases coming to it. It is an active, diligent board, but many new cases come to it, leaving a considerable accumulation of undecided cases. So, in order to expedite the settlement, they organized an advisory board in the Treasury Department, consisting of 12 of the most expert people, able and experienced men in the department, including all branches of the work, for the purpose of expediting settlements. The experienced men thoroughly familiarize themselves with all the facts in a case, and in greater detail than could be done in an ordinary way, because their facilities are greater. Their decisions are entitled to faith and credit.

These 12 men sit as a court, as it were, to decide the facts in all these large disputed cases. They are as competent men as any ordinary court in the country. Some of them are the most expert tax officials in this or any other country. After long examination, after examining all of the evidence, having employed experts of all kinds to ascertain the facts, they come to the conclusion that a certain amount of money is due from a taxpayer, or that a certain amount is due to a taxpayer. They report that fact here. A court does not report to us, especially the Supreme Court. It reports a judgment, and the Court of Claims reports a judgment with a brief statement of facts.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. A court matter is a matter of record, and anybody has access to it, but not to the records of the Treasury Department.

Mr. HAWLEY. That is not the fault of the Treasury Department; that is a provision of law.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The two cases are not analogous.

Mr. HAWLEY. I agree they are not entirely analogous, but I was speaking more to the point of the ability of these men to decide the questions. I believe these men are interested in the welfare of the Government and in securing from the taxpayer all the money that he should pay. In fact, there has been criticism of the officials of the Treasury Department that they were inclined to take the very last dollar from the taxpayer that it was possible to secure from him under any construction of law.

Mr. LOZIER. This controversy involved disputed questions of law and fact. Does not sound public policy suggest that those disputed questions of law and fact be determined by a court?

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes; and I can answer the gentleman's question without his making an argument about it. That is being done now. Where the matter involves mixed questions of law, or mixed questions of law and fact, where the taxpayer believes himself aggrieved, or the Government feels that the taxpayer is not willing to comply with the law written, those cases go to the courts, and those are the ones that should go, but all other matters that are simply matters of judgment, administrative regulation, or decision should be decided in the department administratively.

Mr. LOZIER. Is it not true that the disputed questions of law and fact involved in this case, namely, the amount due, were not submitted to the court, and that the decision of the Treasury Department does not establish a precedent that has the force and finality of a judicial decree?

Mr. HAWLEY. I am interested to know what questions of law arise here, or what mixed questions of law and fact arise. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] attacked the Treasury Department on its estimates. That is a favorite subject of attack on the part of the gentleman from Texas. He is always entertaining. I have often wondered why he did not seek a wider amphitheater for the exhibition of his aptitudes along that line. It might be remunerative to the gentleman. [Laughter.]

However, whose estimate shall we follow? Shall we follow that of the gentleman from Texas, who missed it only about $175,000,000 when the revenue act of 1928 was in course of preparation, and including his estimate on the Treasury condition this year he has missed it only $200,000,000? I fear to follow the gentleman from Texas. What did the Treasury do? In the last few years it has made various estimates of income and expenditures. They have varied from the realized amounts to some extent; that is true. I will set out the facts in the case more fully in the extension of my remarks. But there were changes in the law. Also all taxes depend, of course, upon the progress of business; and coupled with that were questions of the sale of securities, questions involving alien property, questions concerning the sale of war materials, and other questions. These increased the difficulties in making estimates of receipts. We have now largely disposed of those nontax and nonrecurring items, and the Treasury this year has on the total estimate missed it by eight-tenths of 1 per cent, and on the income taxes the Treasury missed it four-tenths of 1 per cent, or about $8,000,000.

Now, here is the situation: The gentleman from Texas sets himself up as a judge of estimates. I concede his position on that side of the House. The Treasury estimates are for the country as a whole. The Treasury's estimate was in error about $33,000,000. The gentleman from Texas missed it by $200,000,000.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. HAWLEY. Certainly.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Did I understand the gentleman to state a few moments ago that his refund to the steel company is being paid to-day?

Mr. HAWLEY. Paid to-day. The law provides that when the Treasury has made a report to the joint committee the joint committee will have 30 days from the date of that notice before the Treasury proceeds to payment, and the Treasury officials advised us that if the settlement was not disturbed they would pay at the expiration of the 30 days, which was midnight last night.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Could the joint committee prevent a payment by protesting?

Mr. HAWLEY. The officials of the Treasury Department, Mr. Alvord and Mr. Bond, both Assistant Secretaries, said, not once, but several times, that if the joint committee did not disturb the settlement they would proceed to the payment and assume the responsibility, but if the joint committee saw fit in any way to disturb the settlement—that is, to take decided action indicating its disapproval—then the joint committee would assume the responsibility. If the joint committee protested against that arrangement, the joint committee would assume the responsibility.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Do you mean by "protesting" preventing the payment?

Mr. HAWLEY. If the joint committee had disapproved this settlement and decided that it ought not to be made, it would go to court.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Then it is using funds out of some other prior allotment to pay that?

Mr. HAWLEY. They are using money for refund purposes authorized in the existing law.

Now, there are many other things that I had in mind to say, but I will confine myself to one other matter. It is admitted by the gentleman——

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. HAWLEY. Certainly.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Do I understand that while Congress is not in session, under your instructions the chief examiner, Mr. Parker, passes on these cases and writes a letter and communicates with the Treasury? Is that correct?

Mr. HAWLEY. He carefully investigates every case, large or small. If he finds no cause to question the finding, he so advises the Treasury. If he finds minor matters, he calls them to the attention of the Treasury. If he finds matters he thinks of importance, he so advises the chairman, and through him the joint committee.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. When Congress is not in session, or even if Congress is in session, he acts for the committee under your direction?

Mr. HAWLEY. Under the directions issued by the former chairman. I am printing in my remarks a statement concerning what Mr. Parker and his staff does.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Then when the committee is not here he acts for the committee?

Mr. HAWLEY. He acts in this way: He examines all the reports that come to the joint committee. If they are regular in form, and no questions occur as to compitations, or no question of the application of the law or the regulations is involved; or if no other question of law or of fact can be raised, he writes to the Treasury Department to the effect that no suggestions are to be made.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes.

Mr. TREADWAY. Did not Mr. Parker report to you constantly during the summer?

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes. Small cases he did not report, but on major cases he did.

Mr. TREADWAY. You were in touch with Mr. Parker even when Congress was not in session?

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes.

Now, I desire to make a few remarks on the Steel case. The United States Steel Corporation consists of the parent corporation, 13 subsidiaries and 181 subsidiaries of subsidiaries.

When the Government assessed a tax the policy of the Steel Corporation was to pay it promptly in full, and to raise no question at the time. However, there were many questions which it did raise finally, within the legal period, as to the meaning of the regulations, the interpretation of the law, and the application of the law to certain items. All of those questions were raised in due time, but the steel company took this position: That during the war, when it was necessary for the Government to have money, that whatever money the Government said was due from the steel company it should have; and that after the war was over all questions between the two should be settled, when the Government was not in the stress it was then in; that it desired to have no disputes and no lawsuits with the Government over the question of taxation at that time. As stated, it paid $217,000,000; and it is asking that under the law and regulations adjustments shall now be made, the proper amount due should be decided and refunds made for the overpayment of its taxes. So far as I know, no allegation of fraud or unlawful practice on the part of the corporation has been raised.

This matter came to the joint committee in due order. I called the joint committee together. Mr. Parker, the expert, reported on it. He had examined it; he had gone into it at some length; he had known it was being considered in the Treasury Department and would come down. He found no fault with the computations nor had he any general criticisms to make of the proposition, but he said it involved certain questions with regard to consolidated returns and invested capital that he did not feel warranted in writing the usual letter without bringing it to the attention of the joint committee. He stated to me that so far as his examination was concerned, he found that at least the amount proposed in the bill is due the Steel Corporation. I called the joint committee together for the purpose of considering the matter. I will not restate what has already been stated regarding the hearings. At the conclusion of the hearings I called the joint committee together in executive session.

The joint committee is not required by law to approve or disapprove a claim. Reports on these claims are sent to us for our information. They can also be obtained by the Committee on Ways and Means, the Committee on Finance of the Senate, and by any special committee appointed for that purpose by either House. After the hearing was concluded, the committee then went into a discussion of what action, if any, the joint committee should take.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Oregon has again expired.

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman five additional minutes.

Mr. HAWLEY. I take the position that a man who has accepted an appointment or an election to an office is obliged to carry out the responsibilities of that office. He is obliged to do that. Now, certain gentlemen have criticized this settlement, but they had a time, Mr. GARNER, of all times, and an opportunity, of all opportunities, in that joint committee, in executive session, to have made a motion to disapprove this settlement. Did they do it? I violate no confidence of the gentleman from Texas or the joint committee when I say he did not make such a motion, because the gentleman from Texas said somewhat enthusiastically the other day that he did neither of these two things.

Mr. SCHAFER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAWLEY. Just briefly.

Mr. SCHAFER. If the gentlemen of the joint committee who oppose this refund on the floor to-day had made a motion at the committee meeting to disapprove, and the motion was carried, then that check would not have gone out to the Steel Corporation to-day. Is my understanding correct?

Mr. HAWLEY. If a motion to disapprove had been carried by the joint committee I understand they would not have sent it out but would in all probability have sent it to the Supreme Court.

Mr. SCHAFER. Then, in other words, they are raising a big cry to-day after they have opened the door and let the horse out. [Laughter.]

Mr. HAWLEY. Well, if it is a horse. I want to say for myself, as one member of that joint committee, that I feel it is incumbent upon me to assume the responsibility imposed by my acceptance of that office. The joint committee has done excellent work. The consideration of refunds is but one item in this work. I am quite sure anyone will agree to that who has had occasion to see its work, its services with reference to the tax laws, amendments to the revenue act, and various other activities in which it is engaged.

I have expressed in writing that I did not believe the settlement should be disturbed. I want to know if any man who believes it ought to have been disturbed has expressed that in writing. I believe the Government has gotten a better settlement on this matter than it would get under any other procedure and that if it had gone to the courts it would at least have added many millions of dollars in interest to the present settlement, if the courts affirmed the settlement as agreed on. The interest for five years at 6 per cent on $15,000,000 would be $4,500,000. The expense of 25 experts working on that during that period would mean a considerable additional amount. I believe that this administrative settlement, along lines of sound business, was the best settlement.

Now, they speak here about taking responsibility for the acts of others. We in this House vote for appropriations amounting to more than $3,000,000,000 reported by the distinguished Appropriations Committee.

How many of us investigate the facts in such cases? We have delegated to them the business of making the investigations and reporting to us. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Oregon has expired.

Mr. HAWLEY. Under the permission to extend and revise my remarks I submit a more extended statement of the matters I discussed and to add some additional information.

The gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] has called the attention of the House to refunds of taxes collected in excess of amounts justly due, particularly emphasizing the total amount to be expended for refunds in this fiscal year. As a result an improper stress has been laid upon one side of the picture only, for he has completely failed to give credit to the Treasury Department for the enormous amounts collected in back taxes in recent years—these amounts being far in excess of the amount of taxes refunded.

He points to the estimated sum of $205,000,000 to be refunded this year. But consider the sum of $245,000,000 which the Treasury estimates will be collected in the same period for back taxes. The Government insists that deficiencies in taxes should be paid and has the power to collect them. It should also as promptly as possible return to taxpayers any excess collected from taxpayers and due them under the law.

In the last three fiscal years refunds and back taxes have been in the following amounts:

Fiscal year ending—	Refunds	Back taxes	Excess of back-tax collections over refunds
June 30, 1926	$182, 220, 051	$295, 982, 056	$113, 762, 005
June 30, 1927	117, 412, 172	331, 476, 826	114, 064, 674
June 30, 1928	148, 286, 061	277, 835, 602	129, 549, 541

In addition to these back taxes—a term which is restricted to collections made after the calendar year has closed—the Treasury every year collects substantial deficiencies before the calendar year closes. These amounts should be added to the figures for back-tax collections, to get a true picture of the results of the Treasury's activities in this respect. Exact figures can not be furnished at this time, but it is conservatively estimated that at least $25,000,000 is obtained annually in this way.

That is, during the last three fiscal years, the Treasury has collected $980,294,484 for deficiencies and back taxes, and refunded on $447,918,284, or an excess of $532,000,000 of deficiencies and back taxes collected over refunds paid. Taxes paid voluntarily in accordance with the returns filed, which in these three years reached the staggering total of over $5,400,000,000, are not included in the above figures. The figures relate only to additional taxes which the Government has claimed and actually collected. This comparison is presented that no false notion may get abroad that the operations of the Treasury consist only in making refunds. It is a large, effective organization for the collecting of taxes, and every year collects in deficiencies and back taxes far more than it has been obliged to refund.

Also the large refunds to which the gentleman has called attention are in part due to decisions of the courts. The decision of the Supreme Court in the case of the National Life Insurance Co., recently decided, will require during this year refunds totaling about $35,000,000. If this amount, together with the $26,000,000 paid to the Steel Corporation, be taken from the estimated total of $205,000,000, we only have left $144,000,000, which is less than the refunds for 1926 or 1928. So that there is nothing startling in the total figure for this year, but they indicate that the Bureau of Internal Revenue is earnestly and successfully dealing with the accumulation of hitherto unsettled cases.

And the gentleman from Texas overlooks another very significant fact; namely, that these refunds are made very largely to correct the errors of the Treasury during years prior to 1921, when the Democratic Party was in power, and these tax laws were being administered by them. Under their administration was inaugurated a system of tax procedure which resulted in virtually driving the whole tax problem into the courts for solution—not for final solution, but for decisions in thousands of individual cases, year after year, leaving the department with its hands tied during a long period of litigation.

What was the result? The staggering total of 22,000 cases in the Board of Tax Appeals in October, 1927, and several thousand cases in the courts. These cases in the Tax Board involved asserted deficiencies totalling about $700,000,000.

Now all that the Treasury Department has been trying to do is to restore the income tax to its proper sphere. It should not be administered by the courts. Its administration should be kept within the confines of the Treasury except in the exceptional cases that really require litigation. It is substituting decent administrative practices for a scandalous system that was bringing the income tax into disrepute. It is not bargaining, or indulging in any improper practice. It is seeking to administer the income tax in the same sensible way that Canada, Great Britain, and other nations have adopted.

Let me give you a concrete example. You, as a taxpayer, find it necessary to value your factory building for depreciation purposes as of March 1, 1913, as the law permits. You fix a value of $150,000. The department's engineers examine the building and say that it was only worth $140,000. A number of years have elapsed since 1913. What is the correct answer? It is a matter on which any 10 real-estate experts might disagree. Suppose the department, to get rid of this as one of these accumulated cases in the Tax Board, concedes a value of $145,000. Is the result unfair, unsound, unwarranted? Is the answer of a court of last resort apt to be any more correct? Such a court may say the value was $140,000, or $160,000, or any other figure. In any event, the conclusion depends on someone's judgment. The department may gain or lose by the litigation. But the litigation is scarcely worth what it costs. It is also expensive to the taxpayer. He is ready to concede something to get the matter settled. Such a settlement is eminently proper, reasonable, and sound.

Or suppose, in the above case, there is another issue involved, namely, whether a promissory note held by the taxpayer has become worthless within the particular taxable year. The taxpayer has been unable to show to the satisfaction of the Treasury that the note became worthless before the year closed, but it is probable that he could obtain testimony that would show this to be the fact. If the Treasury says "We will concede your value of $150,000 for your building if you will concede this other issue and drop your claim for loss on the note," and the taxpayer willingly assents to get the matter settled, is there anything unreasonable or unsound in using such methods as these to get this accumulation of 22,000 cases out of the way? One item is offset against another. Remember that by these methods the Treasury can make available in the next two or three years large amounts of back taxes which will affect the Government's financial position very favorably, save very considerable sums in interest, and that these amounts will play an important part in determining what the tax rates in the next few years are to be.

In all these criticisms the gentleman from Texas would seem to be on as unsound ground as he was when a year ago he predicted that the tax collections would justify a tax reduction of four hundred millions, a figure that subsequent events have shown to be fantastically high.

Remember that every refund or credit of $75,000 or over is reported to the Joint Congressional Committee on Taxation, and is scrutinized by the expert staff of that committee before a cent is paid out on these claims.

These refund problems are a necessary result of the governmental policy of collecting taxes before litigation. Almost every Government, State and National, has such a policy. Particularly during the war years, when revenue was vitally necessary, we could not stop to wait for court decisions. We had to collect first and let the taxpayer pursue his legal remedies afterwards. Since the 1924 revenue act, we give him the right to a decision of the Board of Tax Appeals before an additional tax can be collected. Now, it is imperative that we dispose of the accumulation of old cases of prior years, making refunds whenever due, collecting deficiencies whenever due, the large problem being to dispose of these old cases forever and not have them dragging their weary and costly way for another five or six years from one court to another.

A failure to pass this supplemental appropriation for refunds for this fiscal year would mean just one thing: That interest would be running against the Government at 6 per cent on this sum of $75,000,000—for we must assume that it is really needed—and would continue to run until Congress at a later date appropriates the money. That would mean $4,500,000 interest annually, or over $12,000 a day, expended needlessly but inevitably. And it will not be just a few large corporations that are deprived of the use of this money. Probably 50,000 taxpayers, large and small, mostly small, would be told by the Treasury that they were entitled to a refund but there was no money available.

Moreover, the refund to the United States Steel Corporation, of which Mr. GARNER spoke, will not be paid out of this supplemental appropriation. Under the agreement of settlement the time limit of 30 days expired on January 4, 1929, at midnight.

ESTIMATES OF RECEIPTS AND DISBURSEMENTS—SURPLUSES

The Federal income tax as we now have it largely arose out of the necessities of the World War. In the case of corporations the invested-capital plan was adopted, under which a certain percentage of tax-free income was allowed before determining the net income subject to taxation. Income, excess-profit taxes, or war taxes were imposed. The rates of taxation were very high and the taxable incomes returned were very large for the years 1917, 1918, 1919, and 1920. The determination of invested capital has proved extremely difficult and has necessitated the employment of engineers of various branches of the engineering business, accountants, lawyers, and other experts. The questions arising out of the problems of invested capital, complicated by consolidated returns, have materially delayed the final adjustment of taxes due for these years. It has been found that, in some instances, an excess of taxes was collected and refunds must be made. In other instances there is a deficiency in the tax and the taxpayer is called upon to make further payments.

The amount of back taxes estimated to be collected in any fiscal year, minus the amount of refunds estimated for that year, has been considered as an item of income for such year and included in the estimates as income. This constitutes an irregular, nonrecurrent item which will in the course of time be reduced to a comparatively small amount. Other nonrecurrent sources of receipts have also existed, such as the sale of surplus war material, sale of railroad securities, sale of Federal farm-loan bonds, and other items. The total amount received from these nonrecurrent sources has been in past years a very material item in the Treasury receipts but is gradually becoming of less importance. These items have complicated the estimates of receipts in past years, as it was not possible to forecast with certainty what settlements of income taxes might be made, deficiencies collected, refunds paid, and what sales of securities or property acquired during the war might be effected. But with the growing elimination of these nonrecurrent items the Treasury has been able to estimate with much certainty the receipts from the sources under its control. There seems to be an opinion in the country that the Treasury Department is primarily responsible for estimates of expenditures, but under the Budget system, as now established, estimates of expenditures are prepared by the Director of the Budget, to whom all the departments and bureaus of the Government report. The Treasury Department prepares the estimates on internal revenue, customs receipts, and miscellaneous receipts. It is true that during the years following the war actual receipts from these sources differed very substantially from the estimates. This was due to the unusual conditions which made it extraordinarily difficult to estimate with great accuracy. For example, extensive changes were made in the revenue laws in 1921, 1924, and 1926, and there were rapid and sweeping changes in business conditions, and miscellaneous receipts were particularly difficult to estimate, owing to the large amount of capital assets held by the Government which were being disposed of but as to which it was impossible to foresee the actual time of disposition. Moreover, the Bureau of Internal Revenue was concentrating on the disposition of the accumulation of tax cases resulting from the war years, which made the back-tax item more uncertain than ever, and even under normal circumstances it is almost impossible to estimate in advance what back-tax collections will amount to, depending as they do on the development of facts which can not be foreseen and on court decisions the effect of which can not be anticipated.

With the passing of the unusual conditions which have existed there is every reason to believe that the Treasury estimates of revenue will become more and more accurate and thus deprive the gentleman from Texas of one of his favorite political targets. For instance, for the fiscal year 1928, the Treasury revenue estimates were remarkably accurate. Total ordinary receipts were estimated at $4,075,600,000, whereas actual receipts amounted to $4,042,300,000, a discrepancy of only $33,000,000, which is extremely small when compared with the total figure and amounts to only eight-tenths of 1 per cent. Income-tax receipts varied from estimates by only four-tenths of 1 per cent. This seems remarkably accurate, especially when consideration is given to the uncertain character of several factors and that the whole structure is based upon the progress of business in the country.

There is every reason to believe that the Treasury estimates for the fiscal year 1929 will prove to be as accurate as they were for the fiscal year 1928.

It seems also that the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929, will close with a surplus in the Treasury.

WHOSE ESTIMATE SHALL WE FOLLOW?

But in the matter of estimates of surpluses, whom shall we follow? Mr. GARNER? I fear to do this. This year when we were preparing the revenue act of 1928 he was quite of the opinion that taxes should be reduced some $400,000,000, as I recall, or some $175,000,000 more than was done. He now laments a possible deficit as a "disgrace to the country." His proposal would have made this certain.

THE PREPARATION OF THE BUDGET

The estimates of receipts and disbursements submitted to the President to be transmitted with the Budget letter are not prepared in the Treasury Department, but are compiled in the Bureau of the Budget. The Treasury therefore is not responsible for the Budget statement nor for the figures which appear in the annual message. While the Bureau of the Budget is nominally "in the Treasury" that does not mean that it is under the direction of the Secretary, but, in practice, means only that the offices of the Bureau of the Budget are in the Treasury Building. The Bureau of the Budget reports directly to the President. On the proposed expenditures by the various departments and offices of government the Treasury reports to the Budget Bureau as any other department reports.

The table of receipts and expenditures printed on pages 18 and 19 of the Report of the Secretary of the Treasury, is not prepared in the Treasury, but by the Bureau of the Budget, and transmitted to the Treasury for inclusion in the Secretary's report. The estimates in the table are on the basis of the information received from the several departments and independent offices by the Bureau of the Budget at the time the Budget letter is prepared for printing.

Surplus revenues accruing in any year have been used to reduce the public debt, and any diminution of the debt lessens, for all subsequent years, the interest charges which must be paid out of the receipts from taxation. Between June 30, 1921, and June 30, 1928, surpluses aggregating $2,791,737,355 have been applied on the debt, making an annual decrease in the interest charge of from $115,000,000 to $120,000,000, and a total of several hundred millions for this period of eight years.

I give below information from the Treasury under date of January 4, 1929, showing details of debt and interest reductions.

THE UNDERSECRETARY OF THE TREASURY,
Washington, January 4, 1929.

Hon. W. C. HAWLEY,
Chairman Committee on Ways and Means,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. HAWLEY: I acknowledge your letter of January 2, 1929, requesting certain statistics on the public debt of the United States.

The gross public debt of the United States on February 28, 1921, according to the statement of the public debt issued for that date, amounted to $24,049,527,788.58. This is the date nearest to March 4, 1921, for which an official statement was issued showing the status of the public debt.

There is transmitted herewith a statement showing, on the basis of the daily Treasury statements, the public-debt retirements from specified sources for each fiscal year from 1920 to 1928, among which you will find the retirements from surplus.

You request to be advised as to what the annual interest charge on the public debt was for June 30, 1921, and how much such charge has been reduced since that date. While the average annual interest charge on an accrued basis has been computed as shown in Table 52 (pages 541–543) of the Secretary's Annual Report for the fiscal year 1928, it is the Treasury's view that interest payments actually made in cash during a given fiscal year as stated in published reports are the best information for this purpose. The total payments made in the fiscal year 1921 amounted to $999,144,731, and in the fiscal year 1928 amounted to $731,764,476. This shows a total annual reduction in interest payments of $267,380,255. This saving is the result of debt retirements from the sinking fund, foreign repayments, reductions in the general fund balance, and other miscellaneous sources, and of refunding part of the debt into issues bearing lower rates of interest. The average rate of interest on the public debt has been reduced from 4.292 per cent in 1921 to 3.901 per cent in 1928.

You also request to be advised as to how much of this reduction in the interest charge is due to the application of the surpluses. It is not possible to accurately compute this amount, as the surplus of receipts is generally automatically applied throughout the year to debt reduction and there is no necessity for keeping complete accounts of retirements from this source by particular issues. An estimate, however, has been made from the best available information, which indicates that subsequent annual savings in interest charges on account of the application of the surpluses available between June 30, 1921, and June 30, 1928, aggregating $2,791,737,355, will amount to between $115,000,000 and $120,000,000.

I trust this gives you the information you desire.

Sincerely yours,

OGDEN L. MILLS,
Undersecretary of the Treasury.

DEFICIENCIES AND REFUNDS—METHODS OF SETTLEMENT

The collection of taxes is primarily an administrative matter. When questions involving interpretation of the law are raised, or questions of law and fact, or when for any reason the taxpayer feels himself aggrieved, or the Government finds the taxpayer making claims that seem to it unwarranted by the law, these may be taken to the courts. Court proceedings are slow and expensive for various reasons. In order to expedite the settlement of tax cases Congress created the Board of Tax Appeals, to which any taxpayer might appeal before paying a deficiency assessed against him. Decisions of this board and of the Court of Claims, as well as those of other courts, afford precedents for use in subsequent cases. Modern business with its varied and complex conditions is constantly presenting new income-tax problems, which cases theretofore decided by the courts affect but little. I believe it is to the interest both of the Government and the taxpayer that administrative settlement of tax matters should be the general rule, and this is the policy of the Treasury at this time. In general, the great body of business men in the country are found in actual experience to prefer this method of administrative settlement, as the early disposition of their tax matters affords a very necessary element of certainty in their affairs. A very large proportion of tax returns present simple problems, but there are a great number of returns which involve questions that are by no means easy of determination. What amounts should be allowed in any year arising out of depreciation, depletion, obsolescence, inventories, and so forth, are matters of judgment, to be decided after thorough and careful investigation and the consideration of all the facts in the case.

When cases are referred to the courts it not infrequently happens that before final decision is rendered the taxpayer has gone into bankruptcy, and little or nothing can be collected. The decisions of courts in various jurisdictions are not uniform and are at times contradictory. Some 22,000 cases, involving over $700,000,000, have been referred to the Board of Tax Appeals, which would take the board at least five years to dispose of, not taking into account new cases that may be added. The Board of Tax Appeals is a diligent body and has reduced the above number.

The Board of Tax Appeals, since its organization in July, 1924, received up to June 30, 1927, 28,311 cases, and, during this 3-year period, disposed of 8,893, or 31.52 per cent. There were pending on June 30, 1927, 19,318 cases. On February 29, 1928, the number of cases pending had increased to 21,381, an increase of 2,063 in a period of eight months. During the same 8-months' period the amount of deficiencies involved in pending cases had increased from $517,804,480 to $885,526,232. Delays in the settlement of tax cases should be reduced to the minimum.

In July, 1927, what is known as the Special Advisory Committee was created, consisting of 12 of the best and most experienced men, to administratively consider and settle the more difficult cases. As I understand, the Board of Tax Appeals has been relieved by this committee of a number of cases. During its first year the Special Advisory Committee considered 8,549 cases and disposed of 5,391 by the administrative method. As stated above, the committee has relieved the board of many cases, and has eliminated by settlement several thousand other cases that would have been appealed. Congress has, for some years, been urging the disposition of the accumulated cases, and the Treasury is making a diligent and effective effort to do this. Early settlement eliminates the expenses of litigation, for every day that a case is pending before the courts there is a continued expense. The purpose of the bureau is to give the taxpayer as fair treatment as could be accorded in the court, and at the same time protect the interest of the Government, and, while proper forms of procedure are observed, there is less formality than occurs in the court. The early way out of this wilderness of accumulating cases does not run through the courts.

In a great percentage of income-tax cases, particularly those involving excess-profit and war-profit taxes, and in which invested capital is a factor, it is not possible to determine the tax with strict mathematical accuracy. In these returns there are invariably present items concerning the application of which there is disagreement between the taxpayer and the bureau, such as inventories, depreciation, depletion, obsolescence, and many others which affect the amount of tax to be paid, the deficiency to be collected, or the refund to be made. The determination of such questions rests upon judgment rather than mathematical calculation.

The whole trend in administration in the Bureau of Internal Revenue is to diligently audit revenue returns and close cases, dealing with taxpayers in a courteous and sympathetic manner. With the vast majority of taxpayers the administration of the income tax is growing in approval.

The Treasury has not to my memory indicated any desire to see the income tax abandoned, but, on the contrary, has adopted the administrative method of settlement under the operations of which taxpayers are indicating an increasing satisfaction.

The most certain way to make the revenue tax unacceptable in the country would be for the Government to become litigious and file a multiplicity of suits. It is the purpose to avoid this in all proper cases. Suits involving questions of the interpretation of law, or for the decision of questions of mixed law and fact, or where a taxpayer feels aggrieved and exercises his right to enter a court, or the Treasury believes the interests of the Government can not otherwise be protected will continually occur. But unnecessary suits should be avoided.

And, in passing, let me say that the Secretary of the Treasury does not administer the revenue tax, audit returns, assess deficiencies, or determine refunds. These are committed to the officials who are designated under the law for this service and who work out their problems according to their own program. Deficiencies or refunds as agreed upon are not submitted to the Secretary for his approval; nor does he hasten or delay the adjustment of individual tax cases, as was inferred by Mr. GARNER.

As I understand, the Secretary of the Treasury does not prescribe to the Bureau of Internal Revenue the order in which returns shall be considered which involve the collection of deficiencies or the payment of refunds. The bureau proceeds with its work as rapidly as consistent with accuracy and due consideration. When agreements have been reached with taxpayers upon deficiencies or refunds the deficiencies are collected and the refunds prepared for payment. There is no policy existing in the bureau or in the Treasury under which the decision on cases will be so arranged as to occur at moments that may be said to be politically fortunate. During the consideration of a return in which there are disputed items it can not be forecast with certainty when a conclusion will be agreed upon. There is no reason for holding back the decision on a refund or on a deficiency, and a Committee on Ways and Means has for several years urged the bureau to bring its work current. In accordance with this, as well as with its own desire, cases have been brought to settlement as rapidly as possible.

I have on several occasions differed with the Treasury on tax policies, but as an institution, after many years of experience, and especially during recent years, I have regarded the Treasury proceedings as those which should be pursued by any sound business concern. Any febrile attempt to bring the administration of the present great Secretary of the Treasury into discredit has not been and will not be received by the country as warranted.

UNITED STATES STEEL CORPORATION REFUND

The recent remarks concerning Treasury operations, especially regarding those of the Bureau of Internal Revenue, occurring on the floor of this House, primarily arose out of the settlement with the United States Steel Corporation for taxes for the year 1917. The United States Steel Corporation as a parent concern, is not a manufacturing concern but a holding company. The general organization consisted in 1917 of a total of 195 corporations comprising a parent company, 13 subsidiaries of the parent, and 181 subsidiaries of subsidiaries. With its return of 1917 it paid in round numbers $200,000,000 of tax. Subsequently, upon demands from the Treasury, it paid over $17,000,000 additional tax. The policy of the company was to pay taxes as soon as assessed, and within the legal period to file application for refunds whenever it thought refunds were due. This policy has given the Government the use of the money made in the additional payments for the period of from seven to nine years. Practically all the difficult problems connected with income taxation are involved in this case, including depreciation, depletion, obsolescence, inventories, and so forth, requiring the examination and report of engineers, accountants, lawyers, and other experts. Within the legal period, and in order to preserve its rights, the corporation filed during the past summer a suit in the Court of Claims, in the amount of $101,000,000 principal sum and $60,000,000 interest, or a total of $161,000,000. This suit included, of course, practically every item that has been in dispute during the consideration of this case. Recently, the Bureau of Internal Revenue arrived at a settlement with the company for refunds for 1917, of nearly $16,00,000, with interest of approximately $11,000,000, making a total of a little less than $27,000,000. Involved in this agreement is a final settlement of the taxes of the corporation for the year 1917, and a dismissal of the pending suit in the Court of Claims. In accordance with the law, which requires all settlements for refunds in excess of $75,000 to be reported to the Joint Committee on Internal Revenue Taxation, the bureau so reported on December 17. The case was carefully examined by the division of investigation.

As chairman of the joint committee, I called a meeting at which officials of the Treasury appeared and made a statement to the joint committee of the facts in the case and the considerations that led to the conclusion of this agreement.

Under the revenue act, returns are subject to publicity only to a limited extent, and certain facts regarding returns are not to be made public by any person, no matter what office such person may hold. The law provides that the Committee on Ways and Means of the House, the Committee on Finance of the Senate, and the Joint Committee on Internal Revenue Taxation, can ask the Treasury for certain information for their guidance, but this provision does not set aside that provision of the law which inhibits the publicity of returns. When the joint committee met, the question was raised whether the hearing should be stenographically reported. The Treasury officials were asked if they could speak as freely to the joint committee if the proceedings were to be stenographically reported as they could under the law if no reporter were present, and the officials stated that they would necessarily be restricted in their statements were a reporter present. The committee therefore decided not to have the proceedings stenographically reported, in the interest of the fuller information. The joint committee is not required to approve a refund or to disapprove a refund. Under the law these reports are submitted for the information of the joint committee. However, if the joint committee should seriously object to any settlement involving refunds, doubtless such objections would be given the serious consideration of the Treasury. In fact, the officials stated that if the joint committee entered no objection they would proceed with the settlemen, and when the time arrived, on January 4, for payment, would pay the refund and the Treasury would assume the responsibility for the settlement; but if the joint committee opposed the settlement, and suggested that it should be taken to the court, the responsibility for the outcome must be assumed by the joint committee. At the conclusion of the hearing which lasted some four hours, the joint committee met in executive session. As one of the members, I believe the settlement is favorable to the Government, that it should not be disturbed, and that legal proceedings should be instituted. Litigation would require the attention of a large number of the experts for a period of five years, in all probability, and the payment of a large sum in additional interest, before a final decision by the Supreme Court could be obtained. Mr. GARNER is a member of the joint committee.

I violate no confidence of that committee in stating that he made no motion or made no proposal to disturb the settlement, for he has already made that statement on this floor. I have always held the opinion that a person elected or appointed to office is under obligations to fulfill the duties of the office he has accepted. I submit that if Mr. GARNER were opposed to this settlement he had the opportunity of all opportunities in the joint committee to have made a motion to that effect; but since he did not, by his own act he has tacitly declined to disturb the settlement, leaving the responsibility for such settlement with the Treasury. His speech on the floor of the House may or may not indicate such dissent.

The settlement with the United States Steel Corporation for the years 1918 and 1919 awaits the disposition of that pending for 1917, and in the settlement to be effected for these years the $28,000,000 of credit transferred from 1917 will be taken into the account. If the proposed settlement were to be rejected and the matter litigated, no one can forecast the final outcome; but, in the meantime, interest must be paid by the Government for a period of many years on all refunds ordered by the Supreme Court.

At the hearing it was several times clearly stated by the Treasury officials that the proposed refund would be paid at the end of the statutory period of 30 days; that is, January 4, 1929, if the joint committee did not take unfavorable action. I earnestly suggest that Mr. GARNER neglected his opportunity if he holds the opinion that the proposed settlement should be rejected and the matter submitted to the courts. I have been proceeding on the supposition that this was the discussion of a financial matter in which opportunity was afforded to correct what a member of the joint committee thought was an objectionable action, or at least to express disapprobation in an official way. However, if this is considered as an opening for partisan advantage, that is another story.

The Joint Committee on Internal Revenue Taxation was organized by the election of Hon. William R. Green, then chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, as chairman. Judge Green was authorized to employ a staff of experts and stenographers. With the experts he worked out plans of work which were approved by the joint committee and which have not yet been fully carried out. When I became chairman, after inquiry, I found it not advisable to disturb or set aside investigations in progress, but have suggested some additional inquiries. There is much valuable work yet to be done by the joint committee and its staff in working out the problems involved in income tax legislation. At my request, Mr. L. H. Parker, Chief of the Bureau of Investigation, prepared a brief statement of the plans and work of the joint committee:

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
JOINT COMMITTEE ON INTERNAL REVENUE TAXATION,
Washington, December 28, 1928.

Hon. WILLIS C. HAWLEY,
Chairman Joint Committee on Internal Revenue Taxation,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CHAIRMAN: In accordance with your verbal request of yesterday, I am outlining briefly the procedure followed by this office in connection with the refunds and credits which have been or are being reported to the Joint Committee on Internal Revenue Taxation under the provisions of H. R. 16462, the urgent deficiency bill of February 28, 1927, and under the provisions of section 710 of the revenue act of 1928. The procedure followed was approved by Hon. William R. Green, former chairman of this committee.

Both the urgent deficiency bill and the revenue act of 1928 required that refunds and credits in excess of $75,000 should be reported to the committee by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, together with a copy of his decision in each case. No power to approve or disapprove these credits or refunds was vested in the committee. It was recognized, however, that while the committee had no definite responsibility in the matter of the refunds and credits, that nevertheless Congress had a purpose in enacting this legislation and that there was laid on the committee an obligation to carry out such purpose or purposes.

The purposes which it seemed probable that the Congress had in mind were the subject of conferences between the former chairman, Judge Green, and the writer. It was concluded that the intent of Congress could be analyzed substantially as follows:

First. It appeared to be the purpose that the joint committee should be informed as to the principal reasons for the crediting and refunding of taxes, and that the Congress should also be informed of such reasons if it was thought desirable.

Second. It appeared to be the purpose that the joint committee should be furnished currently with the decision of the commissioner on these important cases, thus allowing it to study the effect of our system of internal-revenue taxation in the concrete instead of studying the effect of this system mainly in the abstract.

Third. It appeared to be the purpose that the committee itself, or its authorized agents, should call to the attention of the Bureau of Internal Revenue or the Treasury Department any final tax determinations resulting in refunds or credits which might seem erroneous, or doubtful, or worthy of further study and investigation. It was understood, that as the committee had no power to approve or disapprove of these matters, that the duty of the committee and its staff was discharged with the making of the above comments, and that the department could act on same as it saw fit.

Judge Green instructed the writer to take charge of the reports made by the commissioner in regard to refunds and credits and to handle same in general conformity with the three purposes named above. It was realized that a complete audit of these cases could not be made, and it was therefore left to the discretion of the writer as to what cases would be especially investigated from the complete files of the Bureau of Internal Revenue. The reports made to the committee and the decisions of the commissioner have in all cases been carefully examined. Cases which have seemed doubtful after such examination have been thoroughly investigated on the doubtful points from the bureau files. Your instructions to the writer upon taking up the chairmanship of the committee were to follow the same procedure as instituted and approved by Judge Green.

In carrying out the above instructions the writer has had also two practical considerations in mind—first, to cause as little interference with the work of the bureau as possible and, second, to cause no interest loss to the Government on account of delays.

Mr. Chesteen, assistant chief of this division and a former auditor of the consolidated returns division of the bureau, has immediate charge of all special investigations requiring an examination of the bureau files. He has been furnished, through the kindness of the commissioner, an office in the National Press Building, where the audit division of the bureau is located. Thus files can be examined by him or his assistant without leaving the building. This prevents many disadvantages which would occur if the files left the custody of the bureau for examination at the Capitol.

A few words seem proper as to the results of the above procedure. In carrying out what appeared to be the first purpose of the Congress in regard to ascertaining the principal reasons for the refunds and credits a complete report on refunds, credits, and abatements was made and furnished each member of the joint committee in January, 1928 (report dated December 8, 1927). This report fully outlines and classifies the principal reasons for such overassessments of tax and also contains a description of certain important individual cases and the comments made thereon to the bureau by this office. A duplicate copy of this report is attached. The joint committee took the matter of submitting this report to the Congress under advisement, and action thereon has not been taken. A similar report is now in process of preparation and will be ready for submittal to the joint committee in January, 1929.

The second purpose which seemed to be in the mind of the Congress was in regard to furnishing a basis for the study of our system of internal-revenue taxation in the concrete in order that defects could be found and means of simplification arrived at. The writer believes that the study of these refunds has brought out matters which have had an important bearing on the following reports already made:

1. Depreciation.
2. Capital gains and losses.
3. Consolidated returns.

4. Interest.

5. Federal taxation of life-insurance companies. The necessity for reports on other subjects has also been seen from this study, among which may be mentioned:

6. Credit of foreign taxes.

7. Depletion.

8. Defects which allow of legal tax avoidance.

9. Valuation methods.

The third purpose of the Congress appeared to be that there should be opportunity for comments to be made to the Treasury Department or the Bureau of Internal Revenue by the joint committee or its agents in regard to specific cases. It is the opinion of the writer that in the main the comments of this division have been helpful to the bureau instead of the reverse, as they have called to the attention of the higher officials certain doubtful issues, and, in at least one instance, seem to have corrected an inconsistent practice. The actual cases where the comments of this division have resulted in reducing the refunds proposed have only been two in number and the amounts saved comparatively small in comparison with the enormous amount of refunds made. Nevertheless the corrections made have been in an amount more than sufficient to pay the expenses of this division since its organization.

The writer would be glad to be advised if the above sufficiently describes our procedure in connection with refunds and credits, and, also, if you desire to make any modifications or changes in our present practice.

Very respectfully,

L. H. PARKER.

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY].

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I feel the time that has been allotted to me could have been used to very much better advantage in the hands of our distinguished chairman. I can only paint the picture perhaps in a little different language from that which he has already so ably used.

In the first place, I want to go a little more completely into what has brought this matter to the attention of the House at this time. It would appear that the question of refunds in taxation is almost a new subject here. Of course, it has been going on indefinitely since the income tax law was first set up and will continue to go on. The total refunds since 1917 have amounted to $975,012,356.33. This is not a new situation at all, but it so happens that under the regulation which requires all reports of claims exceeding $75,000 to be made to the joint committee for its consideration—not approval or disapproval—attention has been concentrated on this hearing at the present time through the gentleman from Texas and I first want to make a reference to that matter.

The chairman has referred to the meeting of the joint committee held on December 17, at which appearance was made by the Treasury Department. There was present a stenographer, and the first question that came up was whether or not we needed his services. The statement was made that it might be embarrassing at a later period in court if this matter was considered in open session, a report of it made stenographically, and then made a public record. It was therefore agreed by the joint committee that we were in executive session and the stenographer was excused.

I do not ever wish to criticize my colleagues, but I do think the House is entitled to a realization of the fact that within 48 hours from that time the distinguished gentleman from Texas took it upon himself to make an hour's speech on the floor delivering to the general public the details of what had happened in the executive session of the joint committee. It does not seem to me that this was either ethical, proper, or under the general parliamentary procedure of the House.

I was very much surprised that he, of all men, knowing how careful he has been in sessions of the Ways and Means Committee to wonder where leaks to the press came from, that he himself should have taken it upon himself to bring the matter in the form of a speech before the House; but there was no deception on his part as to where the leaks came from in this case. The leak was very apparent and the gentleman from Texas was the party that leaked. [Laughter.]

Now, the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLIER], another colleague of ours on the joint committee, has taken exception to what he calls a trade-and-barter system of settling these very intricate cases.

It has been referred to several times that this case, the so-called United States Steel Corporation case, is so intricate, so complicated, and so voluminous that it required 2,400 pages of closely typewritten material to even make a report on it. Still the gentleman from Mississippi says that the method of settlement was a hodgepodge. Why, according to the testimony before the Committee on Appropriations of the Undersecretary, Mr. Bond, three of the ablest men in the department had worked for years on this matter.

Mr. COLLIER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. Yes.

Mr. COLLIER. I quoted the language of Secretary Bond himself where he said, "After offsetting and conceding." If that is not a different name for bartering and trading, I do not know what would be. He used perhaps finer language.

Mr. TREADWAY. In order that the matter may properly be before the Members of the House, let me say that I am somewhat of a Yankee trader. I have never had occasion to trade individually in these millions, of course, but the gentleman knows that we have information that the United States Steel Corporation from the very beginning of the income tax law had paid every claim ever made by the Government in the form of taxation, never had questioned or quibbled, and therefore they naturally brought in a protest when the time came. They did pay the tax, and under the best of audits, if this bill had not been paid at midnight last night, as our chairman has told you, the suit in the Court of Claims would have followed on the part of the United States Steel Corporation representing over $100,000,000 of claims against the United States and in addition to the $100,000,000 there would have been a further claim of $60,000,000 for interest. Now, which is better, to allow all the experts available in the Government to make up this tax bill and say what is a fair compromise and have the United States Steel Corporation agree to that compromise of $15,000,000 with $11,000,000 of interest added, making a total of $26,000,000, or go to court over a long period of years with a greatly involved case, and then be called upon possibly to pay $160,000,000. If this is trade and barter, I am for it.

Inquiry has been made as to whether this transaction would close up all pending tax refunds to the United States Steel Corporation. In reply I would say that the tax for the year 1917 is the only one involved in this settlement. The company paid $216,849,230.56, and, as above stated, filed suit in the Court of Claims for the refund of $101,000,000. This suit is cleaned up and settled by the payment by the Government of the $15,000,000, with interest.

Now, in addition to this, we of the Ways and Means Committee and of the joint committee have insisted continually, Clean up these back cases and get current! No man has used the language of bringing the cases up current more than my good friend GARNER, from Texas, who is always urging the Treasury Department to get current, and here was a case where we could make great headway, and when the Treasury Department offers this opportunity he is not willing to help get current.

Our Democratic friends are always criticizing the overhangs of back cases. We have set up different forms and methods endeavoring to get current. First, the Board of Tax Appeals, which has not been able to make any great headway, because claims are coming in faster than settlements can be made by the board.

Then the Undersecretary of the Treasury, Mr. Mills, whom so many of you remember as one of the great tax experts here, appeared before our joint committee and advised an informal advisory committee to do the very thing that now the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLIER] objects to being done, namely to try to make these settlements without the long, tedious process of law. They have been fairly successful; the number of cases has been materially reduced. Mr. Bond says that there are 12,740 pending, and yet the gentleman objects to the efforts to expedite the work.

Then the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] argues that because our special joint committee had not approved of the settlement of this Steel case the committee must be held to have disapproved of it. That is practically what he said. On the other hand, the law does not give the special joint committee the power or responsibility.

If the joint committee should have passed a vote not approving this settlement, it is probable that the officials of the Treasury would have inferred that the committee thereby assumed the responsibility of having the department proceed to defend itself in the court action which had already been filed by the Steel Corporation. Failing such action, however, the committee thereby indicated its attitude that the matter was one under the jurisdiction of the Treasury itself and for which the Treasury should be required to assume all responsibility.

There has been no dereliction on the part of the joint committee, and the insinuation that one man passes on all these things is not fair to the joint committee, of which the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] himself is a member. It is not fair in this way, that as the chairman has said he is continually in touch with our experts whether Congress is in session or not.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Was this settlement conditioned on the payment being made on January 4?

Mr. TREADWAY. The chairman has explained that.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Was that attached as a condition to the settlement?

Mr. TREADWAY. No; I will ask the chairman to explain it in my time.

Mr. HAWLEY. The settlement was made to take effect on that day, but I do not remember that there was any statement made that if the settlement was objected to by the joint committee the settlement would not be made.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. It seems to me extraordinary if it was not that the Treasury should have proceeded when they knew that the proceeding was pending in an acute form.

Mr. HAWLEY. I am not able to answer more definitely than that. My impression is that the settlement was made to take effect January 4, and if it did not take effect of course that would upset it.

WHAT HAS BEEN DONE BY JOINT COMMITTEE

Mr. TREADWAY. The inquiry of the gentleman from Virginia is pertinent and important. I shall be glad to answer him in detail in revising my remarks.

The principal reason for the prompt release of check to the United States Steel Corporation was to save interest on the total amount of the refund. Another reason was that plans had been made to meet this payment, and the Government, having the money on hand, under its financing plan would gain nothing by holding it. On the other hand, if the refund were not paid within the time limit the Government would be required to pay interest on the amount of the refund at the rate of 6 per cent per annum, which in this case would be about $2,465 a day. The time during which the Treasury Department was required by law to withhold payment of this refund expired at midnight on January 4, being the expiration of the 30-day period specified in the revenue act of 1928. It is probable that if the Treasury had not paid this refund promptly there would now be criticism of the amount of interest which would be accumulating each day.

Now, I want to refer to the work of the joint committee in the various cases referred to it. Here is a brief summary of what has been before the joint committee. The chief examiner of the joint committee, Mr. Parker, makes the following statement of the cases that have been referred to the committee:

Taken as a whole the overassessments submitted by the commissioner to the joint committee show careful, legal, and just handling in the face of many difficult problems.

The review of the overassessments is instructive as to the operation and effect of our revenue acts and as to certain inequitable results permitted under such acts.

Two hundred and ninety-six cases, or 92 per cent, have been clearly proper and allowable on the basis of the facts shown in the report of the commissioner to the joint committee.

Twenty-seven cases, or 8 per cent, have been doubtful on the report of the commissioner and have been specially investigated through the files from the Bureau of Internal Revenue or upon special inquiry addressed to the authorized representative of the Treasury Department.

In regard to the 27 doubtful cases, after special investigation, the following classification can be made:

Sixteen cases were found proper; 9 cases were not computed in accordance with the view of the staff of the committee, but nevertheless were not clearly illegal or outside of the discretionary authority vested in the commissioner by the revenue acts; 1 case appeared not to be in accordance with current board decisions and was promptly withdrawn for review by the general counsel's office when attention was drawn to this fact by the committee's representative; 1 case is awaiting information from the bureau on certain doubtful points.

It is of course apparent that the Members of the House would have no better conception of the intricacies of these cases if there were submitted to them all the documentary evidence accumulated over a period of years by the experts of the Treasury. This refund is based on the complicated tax reports of nearly 200 concerns which constitute the United States Steel Corporation. The selected men in the department have been specially assigned to delve into all the facts. Having confidence in their ability, confidence in the Secretary of the Treasury and his able assistants, the Undersecretary and Assistant Secretary Bond, it would seem to me to be the part of wisdom to act on their judgment. I am confident the House will approve the recommendations of the Treasury and appropriate the $75,000,000 called for in the urgent deficiency bill for the payment of refunds. [Applause.]

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. DEMPSEY].

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, this question of the refund to the United States Steel Corporation comes before this House in a most peculiar way. The question has been raised as to the repayment to-day. If gentlemen will examine the report of the committee which is presenting this bill, they will find in that report the statement that the question of this refund to the United States Steel Co. was not before the House, that it was only before it in a retrospective or historic way, and that report was filed days ago before there was any intimation, as I understand it, that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] would review this question.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEMPSEY. Yes.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. It was filed long after I made the statement on the floor of the House.

Mr. DEMPSEY. The gentleman, as I understand it, did not say that he was going to contest this question on the hearing of this bill.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. What does the gentleman think I was talking to? Just to hear my voice ring?

Mr. DEMPSEY. The gentleman was talking to the matter generally, but the fact is that that report has been here all these days with that statement in it.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Does the gentleman mean the report on this deficiency appropriation bill?

Mr. DEMPSEY. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Oh, the bill was only reported yesterday. The report is dated as of January 4.

Mr. DEMPSEY. The report has been in type and available for days.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. The gentleman is not accurate in that.

Mr. DEMPSEY. That is my understanding.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. I have tried to get the hearings on this case.

Mr. DEMPSEY. I am talking about the report.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. The report could not be gotten up until the hearings were finished.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Oh, yes; it could.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Does the gentleman mean to say that the committee would make up its report without any information on the subject?

Mr. DEMPSEY. Oh, no; but with the minutes of the reporters before them. But let us get to the next question. Is there anything unusual in this matter? This House again and again, and as a matter of universal and uniform and uninterrupted practice, has always observed this course. We take the report from the proper department, and while we swear witnesses, that report in itself and of itself is more important in the usual and ordinary case than all of the hearings of all of the witnesses before us. That should be peculiarly true in this case. Why? In many cases this House has the same facilities for examination, for investigation, as the department itself, but in a case like this, this House has no facilities, has no way in which to make the examination. Unless it finds somewhere in some incidental way something to challenge, it has to accept the finding of the department. Here we find a report so voluminous, involving such a tremendous amount of testimony in its various forms, that it would take trucks to carry them—a whole line of trucks. Here are these gentlemen sitting on this joint committee, listening for five hours, and the gentleman representing the Democratic side [Mr. COLLIER] says, after hearing it, that he would not presume, after spending five hours, to even express an opinion upon that which it had taken 10 years of expert investigation to determine.

In addition, then, to the usual safeguards of the department itself we have this joint committee, and this joint committee does not undertake to challenge, but, on the contrary, the gentleman from Mississippi expressly said and said repeatedly and clearly that he did not challenge the motives, and that all he questioned was the method. The gentleman did not point out a method. He did very clearly cover the point that several methods have been excluded by the Court of Claims and the Board of Tax Appeals, so that the Treasury had only a limited opportunity and a limited way to investigate, and he suggested no alternative to the method that was employed. He did not tell us how that method was improper. He said it was a bargain counter, but I never knew in my experience as a lawyer or as a legislator where a compromise was reached where it was not by the bargain-counter method. Each side has to concede, each side has to give way, each side has to admit that it can not get all that it contends for, and in that way and that way only can a settlement be reached. In addition to the usual methods having been pursued, and, secondly, the protection of the joint committee having been afforded, we have this, which I feel sure I am voicing the sentiment of the whole country in saying: We have the most remarkable, the most eminent Secretary of the Treasury, who has given this country a most unusual administration of that great and high and responsible office. Years after all of us have passed, I hope, to our reward, this Secretary of the Treasury will have his memory enshrined in the minds and in the thoughts and admiration of the American people, in line with and on the same kind of pedestal as Alexander Hamilton, the first great Secretary of the Treasury. And we will not forget also that we have an admirable Commissioner of Internal Revenue, Mr. Blair. So we have the thought that we have at the head of this department of the Government men in whose integrity and ability we can repose the utmost confidence, and then when you come to subordinates, they are the highest paid, the most expertly trained, the ablest men in the service of the Government.

And they have only one conscious object, and that is to do justice and right, and, secondly, back of all that unconsciously all the time is the desire, the honest and proper desire, to make a record for themselves, to show that they have done well for this Government that they are serving, that they have preserved its interest and protected it at all times, that they have given it the best service it could secure in intelligence, in integrity, in a conscientious and active way, and every man here who is brought into contact with this department finds in each and every instance that the individual taxpayer never receives one penny more than that to which he is honestly and justly entitled, and as to which he can show his right to have it. It is not a question of his right to it. He must demonstrate to these vigilant and determined men a clear and indisputable right before he receives one penny of refund. There being no charge of fraud, there being no suspicion of collusion, there being the admission that these men have acted uprightly and honestly and with intent to protect the Government; and it appearing that in this particular case a claim of $160,000,000 is to be settled for $26,000,000, a most splendid result for the Government; and with this tremendous amount of evidence involved, with the case certain to take a prolonged period of time and to be litigated at enormous expense; and with this Congress having directed the Treasury Department, as it did by the act passed in May that it must do precisely what was done in this case, why should not the Treasury Department be commended for the work which it has accomplished, for the result that has been attained, rather than be criticized when it is admitted that there is no sound or just ground of criticism? No one points out any mistake.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Chairman, do I understand the gentleman from Kansas has but one more speech?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. BYRNS. Then, Mr. Chairman, I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Texas.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas is recognized.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by including in those remarks official communications from the Treasury Department and from the chief examiner of the joint committee of the House and Senate.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by including statements of the Treasury Department and of the chief examiner of the joint committee. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I did not intend again to refer to the question of estimates that I spoke about the other day when I had the pleasure of addressing the House of Representatives. But since my friend from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY], as well as my friend from Oregon [Mr. HAWLEY], have referred to estimates, I think I shall again detain the committee for five minutes on that subject.

I saw in the newspapers, after I had made the statement on the floor of the House concerning the estimates and the misleading of the Congress by those estimates into the passage of a bill which they would not have otherwise passed, in my opinion, the Secretary of the Treasury said that my statement did not fit the settlement. He did not give the facts and he did not show wherein my statement did not fit the settlement. He also stated that he spoke with responsibility and that I spoke without responsibility. I do not know just what he meant to imply by that term, but if he meant to say that the Constitution of the United States threw around me a cloak that did not also protect him, for the purposes of this discussion or that discussion, the Constitution can go out of the window, so far as I am concerned.

I am going to utilize this five minutes, and I am not going to make a single statement myself; but am going to let the President of the United States make the statement. On December 4, 1928, the President of the United States, in response to his duties, sent a message to the Congress reciting the state of the Union, and among other things he said this—

> Last June the estimates showed a threatened deficit for the current fiscal year of $94,000,000. Under my direction the departments began saving all they could out of their present appropriations. The last tax reduction brought an encouraging improvement in business, beginning early in October, which will also increase our revenue. The combination of economy and good times now indicates a surplus of about $37,000,000.

That was on December 4. He also sent a message to Congress on December 11, and it reads, in part, thus:

> I have the honor to submit herewith for your consideration a supplemental estimate of appropriations for the Treasury Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929, and prior years for refunding internal-revenue taxes illegally and erroneously collected, $75,000,000.

Now, it does not take a third-grade mathematician to tell the difference in the condition of the Treasury on December 11 and the condition on December 4. If you take $37,000,000 from $75,000,000 you will have $38,000,000 left.

But that is not all. We had in the meantime passed the Greek loan bill drawing on the Treasury for $12,000,000, a sum that would make the deficit $50,000,000. I stated then, and I repeat now, that as the result of misinformation given to the House of Representatives—not intentionally by the President; I do not suppose that anybody would say that any President of the United States would make an erroneous statement intentionally—but the facts showed that the Treasury were "in the red" for $38,000,000 at that time. Who caused him to make that mistake? Undoubtedly the Treasury Department was the place where he got the information on which he based his statement.

I said then that it was getting goods under false pretenses for the Secretary of the Treasury to come before the Committee on Ways and Means on the 6th day of December urging us to spend $12,000,000 on the Greek loan when, as a matter of fact, his officers knew there was a deficit of $38,000,000, and that, added to the $12,000,000 of the Greek loan, would make $50,000,000. I do not believe it is right in making estimates to fit them according to the way you want Congress to vote. I criticized it, and I criticize it again, and I think it my duty to criticize it.

Gentlemen have referred to the estimate I made a year or two ago on tax collections. That estimate was within $5,000,000 of being correct. In the consideration of that same bill Mr. Mills, the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, when before the Committee on Ways and Means considering that legislation, estimated the refunds for this year at $138,000,000. I will put that extract from the hearing in the RECORD. (See Exhibit No. 1.)

I had the right to depend upon that estimate. It turned out to be $67,000,000 wrong. You will remember that I also told the House that if we should abolish affiliated and consolidated returns we would get $50,000,000 more. We got an admission out of the Treasury that we would get $25,000,000, and I made an estimate of $50,000,000. I made some other estimates that accounted for $117,000,000 that you could reduce taxes. But I do not want to refer to the estimates to a greater extent. I believe I have had pretty good luck in making estimates, at least I am willing to compare mine with the Secretary of the Treasury, with all of his information. For the last seven years take the record and check it up and see whose estimate was the closest.

But I want to discuss just for a moment the basis of information that this House has with reference to this refund. Now, I want each of you to ask yourself this question: What do you know, if anything, about the merits of the $75,000,000 for tax refunds in this bill?

Are you willing to go home to your constituency and say that you voted for an appropriation of $75,000,000 to pay refunds, when you had no knowledge as to the merits of a single one of them? The highest approval we can give of any claim against the Government, the final and conclusive approval of that claim against the Government, whatever it may be, is by appropriating the money to pay it, is it not? And you are going to appropriate $75,000,000 for refunds that you have got to admit to your constituents you do not know anything on earth about the merits of. Now, does anybody controvert that?

Whose duty is it to find out about the merits of a claim in excess of $75,000? It is the duty of Mr. HAWLEY and his joint committee. In addition to that it is the duty of the Appropriations Committee in the final analysis, but it is the duty of the joint committee to give you information. When I appeared before the Appropriations Committee day before yesterday they complained very bitterly and said it was not their fault that you had no information; that they had a duty to perform and they could not afford to go into the question of the merits of this proposition, but it was the duty of the joint committee, did you not? I await someone to dispute it. Gentlemen, I do not control the joint committee. I wish I did. I would have an investigation, and the only information we have ever gotten is because the clerk of the joint committee, a conscientious fellow, said this was such a stupendous claim that he wanted Mr. HAWLEY to call the committee together, and he did call it together for that purpose the first time since it has been in existence. And what did it do? It had a 5-hour hearing, and it developed the facts as they have been set out here by Mr. COLLIER and others. It developed a fact that you did not know anything about and that I did not know anything about, and no one would ever have known anything about it if we had not had this little investigation.

It developed the fact that instead of a refund of $15,000,000, the Steel Corporation had already received $31,000,000 on the same year's taxes. I said, "That can not be so." They said, "Yes, sir; that is so; we have already refunded that to them by giving them credit on their taxes for that year, a credit of $31,000,000." Then we tried to find out how they settled this case. We found out from the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury that they settled this case by considering four methods, not by regulations of the department, which had been made down there for 10 years, good regulations, regulations that all taxes ought to have been settled by and regulations that most all taxes have been settled by. He did not settle it by the regulations of the department, he did not settle it according to the decision of the Board of Tax Appeals, neither did he settle it by the rule of the Court of Claims, but he settled it by another rule, with the assistance of the opinion of the lawyer of the Steel Corporation. That is in the hearings. He considered four sources. He considered, first, the regulations of the department; second, the Board of Tax Appeals; third, the Court of Claims; and, fourth, the opinion of the lawyer of the United States Steel Corporation. Now, I said, "That is wrong, Mr. Secretary." "Well," he said, "I think we are getting off for less than if they went into court." That was his reply. I said, "Mr. Secretary, if the Steel Corporation does not owe these taxes you ought not to cheat them out of them and force them to pay more than they ought to pay; you ought not to bargain with them and get them to pay more than the law requires." That is the reason I condemn this bargaining transaction across the counter by the Treasury Department.

Ah, I think I can illustrate it so it will impress you. There was a report over here the other day about a refund to another company. There was a report about a refund made to the Aluminum Co. of America but you only saw this information in the newspapers. You get your newspaper and look at it and you will see this information: "Refund to the Aluminum Co. of America, $621,626.04." That is what you saw in the newspaper but that was not all of it; that was not the picture. In that same document, which is not given out for publication, which is a secret, a secret to all intents and purposes as far as you gentlemen are concerned and as far as I am concerned, until I got permission to look at it. I am a member of the committee, but the clerk over there is so careful, so jealous of his prerogatives and not wishing to extend them or to exceed them that he said, "I wish you would go and see Mr. HAWLEY and get his permission." I did and I did get some information. I am a member of the committee but I can not even see the papers in his archives which are official documents, sent there by virtue of law. The Aluminum Co. of America had already been allowed as a credit $665,177.18, and in abatement they give them just a little Christmas present, $622,249.46, or a grand total of refunds and credits for taxes paid in one year, 1917, of $1,287,426.64.

Now, here is what I want to call your attention to. How did they arrive at that amount? According to Mr. Bond, in the Treasury Department, they arrived at it by four different methods.

One, the regulations of the department, the decision in the Grand Rapids case and the United Cigar Stores case, and what else? The attorney for the Aluminum Co. Mr. Mellon, this grand Secretary that you hear so much about to-day, this man who will never perish from the thoughts of the American people when we are gone and forgotten, this man sits on that side of the table as Secretary of the Treasury, and if reports are correct that he owns the Aluminum Co., Mr. Mellon, the citizen of Pittsburgh, Pa., sits on this side and determines how much he owes the Government.

Do you think this system is a good system? Do you believe it is a good system that you have no regulation or measuring stick to see definitely how much is owed by taxpayers? If you had a law that would say to the Aluminum Co., "You owe so much in taxes and you can not get off for a dollar less," that would be one thing; but instead of that, according to the hearings, both before our committee and the hearings here, they try to settle it as a compromise settlement.

Do you think the Government is going to get the best of it when the Aluminum Co. of America starts in to compromise with the Secretary of the Treasury? [Laughter.] We have laws in most States that a judge can not sit in the trial of a case where he has an interest. I know that is the law in Texas, and I presume it is the law in most of the States, because undoubtedly it is a wise law. Here is a man sitting in judgment on large sums of money, millions of dollars involved, trying the case, if current reports are correct, of a concern in which he controls or owns a majority of the stock.

Do you believe this is good public policy? Do you believe you can defend this before the American people? Ah, sir, what I would do if I were Secretary of the Treasury under present conditions! The Secretary, as I recall, resigned as a director in sixty-odd corporations when he went into the Treasury Department. They have had applications for refunds.

Under the law at the present time he can sit down and reach an agreement with any one of them that is binding on the American people, accepting 10 cents on the dollar for the amount of taxes due. I would be proud to say ," Yes; I own these great corporations or I am interested in them. I have made a success in life." I admire him for the success he has made in life. I am not opposed to big business; I am for big business and I believe in it. I believe it has helped to develop this country and I am not an enemy of big business; but I would be proud of the fact, if I were Andrew Mellon, that I had made a success in business and I would herald to the American people the corporations in which I was interested and how much taxes they had paid and how much in refunds I had given them and how many credits they had been given, and I would say I was proud of it; but he will not do this. He will not even let you look at them.

Secrecy! Why, Mr. TREADWAY, you were speaking about my leaking, and I thought at the time that every time we have a meeting over there, generally, TREADWAY is the first one to get to the door to leak and I think he was jealous because he was not there that night. [Laughter.] I think he was just a little jealous, and I am not blaming him for not being there because a man of his social standing and qualities could not afford to come out at night even to attend a meeting of the joint committee. [Laughter.]

Now, Mr. HAWLEY, I am going to call on you, sir. We have some records over there and I am going to put some of them in the RECORD. Here is one of them which was sent to each Member. I tried to get it published, you will remember. We have on the Army bill, how many pages of hearings, Mr. ANTHONY?

Mr. ANTHONY. About 1,000.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. About 1,000 pages. For one-half the money it took to take down and print the hearings on one appropriation bill you can publish every official record there is in the joint committee. Why do you not do it? They are official documents. They are documents of that committee bearing on the duties which you assigned us to perform. You can not get to them. Let me see one of you come over there and try to see one of them. I could not even see one of them without getting permission. I ask you now, sir, will you publish and put in print the actions of your committee since it has been in existence? I do not see Mr. HAWLEY here just now, but I call on him, as a matter of public record, to make them public and let the country see them. You ought not to be ashamed of them. And whenever you find a Member of Congress who is so anxious, outside of matters of foreign affairs, to keep everything in his committee secret he is not trying to serve the House of Representatives or the country, in my opinion, like he ought to.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Yes; but I do not want any oration like you made this morning. I want a question.

Mr. DEMPSEY. The chairman of the gentleman's committee said that there was an understanding in the committee that the proceedings of the committee should not be made public because they might embarrass the lawsuit and lose that case to the United States if the case proceeded.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. I will tell you about that, and that will satisfy you without asking any more questions. Here is what happened: I notified him in advance that he must have a stenographer there. I asked for a stenographer. I said I thought we ought to have our hearings taken down, and when we got there we discussed the matter and the Treasury Department said it might hurt them. That is what they said. They decided not to have it taken down. I said, "I am going to tell everything that happens in here." I gave them fair notice right then. Now, there was but one thing to do, and that is what they do in some of the churches—I believe in the Baptist Church—and that is to "withdraw from me." [Laughter.] Now, they did not withdraw from me, and I kept my promise, because I am telling it and I am going to continue to do it. [Applause.] So I have not breached any faith, to say the least of it.

Mr. LOZIER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Yes.

Mr. LOZIER. There was no agreement in which the gentleman from Texas, and the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLIER] participated that the proceedings should be kept secret?

Mr. GARNER of Texas. No; never. Now, Mr. HAWLEY and Mr. ANTHONY—God bless him—I do not think there has ever been a better man in Congress than DAN ANTHONY. [Applause.] I have had a good deal better opportunity of knowing him than many of you gentlemen have. [Applause.]

They want it to appear that the Steel Corporation is all that is involved. Let me tell you something. I went to the Treasury Department, or rather I telephoned up there—but before I get to that I will give you some of the other cases that came up this fiscal year. I said to Mr. Parker, I want you to give me five of the next largest cases that is to be paid out of this money. He said, "Mr. GARNER, I do not want to do that, I may get into a good deal of trouble," and asked me to get Mr. HAWLEY'S permission. Mr. HAWLEY said, "Yes; give them to him," and so he gave them to me. They amounted—these five cases—to twenty-four million and some dollars. None of these were published in the papers among the list of refunds for they were for this fiscal year but are to be paid out of your money—money that belongs to the people of this country. You never knew anything about it; now five of these largest cases I will put in the RECORD. (See Exhibit No. 2.)

I did not know about these credits being so much until we got into the Steel Corporation. The other day I said that $65,000,000 would go back to the Steel Corporation. The Treasury Department said that my statement did not fit the facts. "Well," I said to myself, "you better look into that proposition, perhaps you have made a mistake." I based it upon what Mr. Parker told the joint committee. I said to Mr. Parker, "You told me this, and Mr. Mellon said that my statement does not fit the facts, and that is the only one I do not know about. Will you not give me the items sustaining the statement?" I said, "Parker, does your record and the Treasury Department's agree?" He said, "I think they would." I said, "I wish you would go up there and see the Treasury Department and let them audit this statement that you have given me." He came back in a few days and said that they had looked it over and made a change of $2,000—a change of $2,000 out of a total of $69,000,000.

Now, remember this—the tax that was voluntarily rendered under the Democratic administration, and this greatest Treasurer of all times since the days of Alexander Hamilton—has given back $69,000,000. Does that shock anybody? This angelic company that voluntarily paid the money. The Treasury Department should have said, "I will not charge you what McAdoo increased the amount; we will accept the $199,198,000." But instead of that Mr. Mellon cut it down to $173,000,000—from $217,000,000. I say I don't know whether that is right or not, but somebody ought to know besides the Treasury Department.

This House ought to have some information in a transaction of that character. Ah, sir; we have some. They would make it appear here that there is no criticism of these refunds. You remember that I asked Mr. HAWLEY when he spoke a few moments ago if this man was his agent, and he said yes. He is the only man that goes to the Treasury Department. HAWLEY does not go up there, I do not, and we do not have a meeting more than once a year, but this fellow goes up there and examines. The law says that the committee can go up there and look at it, and he has gone up there as the agent of the committee and he has looked at it. I want to show you how he has to do to defend himself. You remember the other day that you saw something about the R. J. Reynolds Tobacco Co. being refunded $6,500,000. Was there any criticism of that by the joint committee? Yes. This agent criticized it and protested against its payment. How else could you protest except through this joint committee? This man went up there and examined it, and here are 25 pages of manuscript urging three good reasons why it should not be paid. Did that have any effect on the Treasury? No. They said, just like BILL WOOD says, that that committee was never intended for any purpose, and that it is not worth a damn anyway. I am going to put the record of this case into the RECORD. He uses the term "X Tobacco Co." He was afraid to put it in its right name, but in the course of his statement I easily identified it with the Reynolds Tobacco Co., because it is the largest one, and is the largest refund. So I take the responsibility here and now, although Mr. Parker marked it as the "X Tobacco Co.," of saying that it was the Reynolds Tobacco Co., so the record may show it. If somebody wants to deny it, I shall furnish the proof. I am going to put that into the RECORD. (See Exhibit No. 3.)

Mr. Parker points out three distinct reasons why that thing should not be paid.

They say that you must not impugn the Treasury Department. I do not charge the passing of money from hand to hand. No. But what is the difference to me when I lose a billion dollars from the Treasury Department, whether it is handed out, sneaklike, at night, or by rules and regulations and bargains across the counter, where I lose the same amount? My loss is the same, whether you filch it from my pocket or barter it away across the table.

I shall make another statement, although it may cost this fellow his head. I forced him yesterday almost to give me this statement. I said, "Parker, it is from your source and your source alone that we get this information. I have nothing here except what you furnish me; I have no way of determining from that data how much has been paid by the Treasury Department that was not authorized in law or in equity, and I want you to tell me your best judgment of how much money the Treasury Department has paid out in the few cases that you have examined that was not justified by law and equity." He said, "Mr. GARNER, I do not like to do that." I said, "By the gods, it is your duty to do it. You are drawing a salary from this Government, you are an honest man, and you ought to have courage enough to speak." He did not want to say anything, because he might see in the distance his job vanishing, and I do not blame the fellow, but I forced him along, and he finally said at least $20,000,000, which I have questioned. In the few cases that Mr. Parker has examined in the Treasury Department—and he is an expert accountant and engineer and a man of long experience, who served in the Treasury Department, under an almost forced admission—he says that in his judgment the Treasury Department has handed back to the taxpayer over his criticism and protest where he had no legal or equitable right to it, money to the amount of $20,000,000! In the face of that, the only information you have, coming from your own committee, how can you make an appropriation of $75,000,000? Why not delay this appropriation until you can get an investigation? You are the only power, Mr. ANTHONY, that can reach this situation. When you withhold this $75,000,000, the Treasury Department and the country are going to understand that somebody is going to look into the matter. Why do not you look into it?

I am willing, Mr. LONGWORTH, for you to appoint a committee of five—three Republicans and two Democrats—and you may select your own committeemen with the experts that you now have, who are drawing salaries, a half dozen of them, of from three to six thousand dollars a year, to make an investigation. There is plenty of time. Let us investigate the matter. But they will not give us any information at all, and Mr. HAWLEY had the audacity to say that that was the fault of Congress! True, Congress passed a law, and it is on the statute books, but does anybody remember how strongly the Treasury Department fought the publicity of tax returns? Nobody led the fight more than Mr. Mills and Mr. Mellon against publicity. This joint committee is a compromise on that proposition, and as Mr. WOOD said, of course, speaking for the Treasury Department, because he hikes up there any time he gets the slightest information, and after I made the statement there to the Appropriations Committee and it was taken down, of course Bill hiked it up there within an hour; but as Bill said, the joint committee was never intended for any purpose, and it was just $40,000 to keep them from looking at Uncle Andy's books, and it was a cheap price, was it not? To keep them from looking at the books. Do you not think it is cheap? But you said you did not think it was worth a damn anyway, and I agree with you, unless HAWLEY would do something with it.

[Laughter.] I will put that statement of Mr. Parker's into the RECORD. (See Exhibit No. 4.) Sixty-nine million dollars. Remember, I said $65,000,000, and when I make estimates I try to underestimate. I thought, since I saw so much of these credits and refunds, that the credits were outrunning the refunds. Mr. ANTHONY, I reckon that you made the report, or your clerk did, or Mr. WOOD's clerk, and you reported how much back taxes you had collected, and how much refund there was. According to the RECORD here, you ought to have reported the credits, which may be more than a billion dollars.

Be fair. Give the full picture. You would have done it, I guess, if you had had that information; but the records show here in the steel case that the credit was twice the refund, that it had already been credited with twice the refund that nobody knew anything about. I telephoned to Mr. Alvord, and I said, "Alvord, a certain friend of mine has told me that they have a list of credits up there." I do not believe that Mr. Alvord would deliberately say anything that he did not believe to be true. If he had the knowledge he would tell you the truth about it. I telephoned, and I said, "I would like you to send me a list of credits that you have—corporations—prior to the time that they would have to report to the joint committee." And he said, "I have not a list of them, and it would take considerable labor to do that."

"Well," I said, "I thought you had a list. If you have not a list, will you send me up 25 of the largest corporations?" He said, "I think I can send them up to you." He did. What do I find from them? I am going to put this all in the RECORD. (See Exhibit No. 5.) He does not give me the names of the corporations, but you can get them over in the committee room now. What was the object in not putting in the names? Mr. Alvord did not want to take the responsibility, and I did not want to see him get his head cut off. I said, "All right, Alvord; send them up without mentioning the names."

Now, what do I find on the subject of refunds? "Adjusted by refunds, $1,026,000; adjusted by credit, $24,562,000; adjusted by agreement, $5,496,000."

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Chairman, can the gentleman state in what years those occur?

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Yes. Original taxes for various years.

How much of these taxes are being refunded and go back to the taxpayers? They try to make it appear to you that the percentages are small. But take this case of the United States Steel Corporation: $173,000,000 taxes; $69,000,000 returned. They are figured out in the percentages. Here is one of these corporations—I do not know what one it was, but it was a good large one: Original tax, $22,000,000; credit—not refund, but credit—$7,787,686. In some cases they are more than 33⅓ per cent. Here is an original tax for 1919: $927,000; and tax, none. He gets all of his back. Andy Mellon just made a clear swipe of his, and gave them all back.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. These credits are all practically refunds?

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Yes; they are all practically refunds. But you do not know anything about them, Mr. MOORE, because the Secretary of the Treasury does not have to report it now under the law.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Certainly.

Mr. ANTHONY. Are any of these so-called credits offsets against additional taxes?

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Certainly. Here is a man from the Steel Corporation, the best taxpayer of the country. The Treasury Department says it is one of the finest that there is. Here is an agent from the Steel Corporation paying taxes every time they tell it to. But they never said anything to CARTER GLASS, or McAdoo, or Houston about giving them back anything. Every time that McAdoo, or CARTER GLASS, or Houston examined them their taxes went up, and every time they examined them under Uncle Andy the taxes went down.

That is a darned funny thing how they can do that. Four of them or five of them under a Democratic administration, all good auditors, lawyers, engineers, accountants—in all cases that went up to McAdoo and were investigated the taxes went up. Under CARTER GLASS an audit was made and they found more taxes. Houston went in, and before he went out they paid him $4,000,000. Then Uncle Andy gets in and they wait to size him up; and they wait until after the election of 1924, and then they asked him to give them back $44,000,000. Each audit that Andy made resulted in the taxes being reduced.

Gentlemen, does that seem natural? I wonder why the Aluminum Co. of America did not say something to McAdoo and to CARTER GLASS and to Houston about paying too much taxes. They paid too much in 1917. They never said anything about it until Andy got in, and then Brother Charles, or his nephew, or whoever it was, said, "Mr. Mellon, you used to be a director of the company. It is true we were prosperous, but when those damned Democrats were in power they collected too much money from us. I want you to adjust this thing." Now, the Secretary of the Treasury did it without law or regulations. There is no rule or law governing the department; no rule or law by court or by a board of tax appeals or a court of claims. The agent said, "I want to tell you that the Democrats collected too much money, and I want you to adjust it." And Uncle Andy, like one of those little cupids, said, "We will see about it"; and he said, "Who is our best auditor?" They can make any kind of report you need. He sends them up, and audits it, and comes back and says, "It is right. For that one year alone McAdoo made you pay $1,187,000 too much." Of course Uncle Andy may not have had any stock in it, and was not interested; but he made the settlement.

Gentlemen, that is wrong. If it were my own brother, or a Democrat of any standing, I would say it is damnable. But you let a man sit across the table there and settle his own taxes without a rule of law or a regulation of the department governing him. When Congress inquires about it he says, "I can not let you look into it. You can not investigate it. You must not look into the facts, because I am the greatest Secretary of the Treasury since Alexander Hamilton. [Laughter.] I will say this: He is the greatest Santa Clause that has ever been in existence. There is nobody to whom he has not given things. I would like some of you to find out and tell the total credits that have been allowed.

I have got the total refunds and they are over $1,000,000,000. Up to this time you have provided for refunds over $1,000,000,000. They say nine hundred and ninety some millions, but that does not include this fiscal year. Now, from the investigation we have made it is shown that these credits are much larger in each instance than the refunds, we have a right to conclude that Andy has handed back to the taxpayers since he came into office more than $2,000,000,000.

Mr. WYANT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Yes.

Mr. WYANT. Has the gentleman a statement showing the amount of back taxes which have been collected by the present Secretary of the Treasury?

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Oh, yes. All you have to do, sir, is to read the report, and it amounts to $4,000,000,000, plus. I never knew that the people in this country were such gumps, especially these big fellows. You know they seem to be the only people who did not know how to render their taxes, or did not have sense enough to render them, these rich corporations. Everybody had sense enough to render their taxes and know how much to pay, but the rich corporations that did not have any lawyers; they did not have any accountants, they were short of engineers and did not have any way of ascertaining how much taxes they owed, just came in and made a big rendition because they loved the country, and then when Andy got in they said, "We don't love it quite as much as we did; give it back to us," and Andy has been giving it back ever since at the rate of a couple of hundred millions to $400,000,000 a year.

Now, gentlemen, if you will refuse to make this appropriation here is what will happen—and you are going to vote on it; you are going to do that; you are going to approve this by your vote on paper, if I am not mistaken—if you will refuse to make this appropriation that fellow sitting there, Mr. HAWLEY, that other bald-headed fellow that sits in the Speaker's chair, and the leader on your side, will get together and say, "Now, they are not going to give this money; we have got to make an investigation so we can get the confidence of this House," and they will make it. Why should it not be made? Mr. Mellon, are you afraid for this House to look into your administration? If you are, then there is all the more reason why we should look into it. If you are not afraid to have it looked into, why do you not welcome an investigation with open arms and say, "I am ready; come on." You will get your money and no honest taxpayer will lose a dollar by that investigation. That is what I am driving at now, trying to get Mr. HAWLEY and his joint committee to do what you asked them to do when you created them and what you expected them to do and what they have not done. But Mr. Parker has attended to his duty. He has communicated with the committee. Mr. HAWLEY was not present to answer my question so I will ask him again. For one-half the cost that Mr. ANTHONY spent in reporting his last bill you can have all the proceedings before the joint committee printed. Will you do it? I will give you time to answer in my time.

Mr. HAWLEY. The 1928 act authorizes us to print, and requires us to print, the reports which we get in at the end of the year, and that will be done.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Are you willing to print the correspondence which your agent, Mr. Parker, has sent in? Why do you not print it in a public document so that these fellows here can see it? You have the printing privilege and by printing it you will let the Congress see what you have in there.

Mr. HAWLEY. I do not think it is within the province of the chairman of a committee to determine a question of that kind. I think that is for the full committee.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Now, just wait. Now, then, Mr. HAWLEY, you are the chairman of the committee. Will you call them together and ask their permission to print it?

Mr. HAWLEY. There will be a meeting of the joint committee and I suggest to the gentleman from Texas that the matter of printing be taken up at that time. [Laughter.]

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Well, poor old HAWLEY. I feel sorry for him and I will tell you what he was not deserving of. They gave him a dirty dig in the Treasury Department. They did not think what they were doing or they would not have done it, but I am going to read it for the benefit of you ladies and gentlemen on this side.

HAWLEY and Senator SMOOT were in favor of approving the steel settlement. It is my recollection that SMOOT made the motion and HAWLEY wanted to do it. DAVE REED is a pretty smart fellow and I think one of the ablest men in this country. He was fair and frank enough when we started into this case to say, "Gentlemen, my firm is attorney for the Steel Corporation but not its tax attorney." I said, "That does not disqualify you at all in my opinion, because I think you are conscientious enough to serve the Government instead of serving your firm," and I believe this about DAVE REED; and when the approval came up to DAVE REED, he said, "No; in view of this hearing I will not take the responsibility of approving it." He said this although the corporation is located in Pittsburgh, Pa. Poor HAWLEY wanted to just approve it. HAWLEY is such an obedient vassal that whatever Andrew Mellon would ask him that did not involve dishonor he would do. He has no judgment on the subject. He does not want any, he does not need any.

Mr. HAWLEY. Will the gentleman yield on that point?

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Certainly, I will yield.

Mr. HAWLEY. Let me ask the gentleman two or three questions. The Secretary wanted the estate tax repealed, did I not oppose it?

Mr. GARNER of Texas. You did, and I commend you for it.

Mr. HAWLEY. He also wanted the intermediate brackets of the surtax changed, did I approve of that?

Mr. GARNER of Texas. You changed them downward, HAWLEY.

Mr. HAWLEY. Not this last time.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. No; not this last time and I do not blame you. When you put them at 20 per cent, Mr. Mellon said he would never ask for any lower rate.

Mr. HAWLEY. That is not answering the question. They proposed a revision of the intermediate brackets downward and I opposed them.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Sure; because he was violating his agreement and you would not violate yours. I just said that about the gentleman.

Mr. HAWLEY. They also opposed the repeal of the automobile tax and I favored it.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Yes.

Mr. HAWLEY. I might go on and give other instances.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. That is all right. You are doing very well, HAWLEY, and I hope you will keep it up. [Laughter.]

I tell the House what I wish, gentlemen. I love this House of Representatives. I have served here a quarter of a century. I think that in the House of Representatives lies the safety of the Republic. Ah, sir, I just wish you, HAWLEY, had a little iron up your backbone like Sereno Paine and Claude Kitchin had and would tell the Treasury Department what to do rather than have them tell you what to do. [Laughter and applause.] That is what you ought to do. Let the House of Representatives and the Ways and Means Committee, that the Constitution provides shall raise revenue, do the job, rather than have the Treasury Department crook its finger and tell you just what you should do and how you should do it.

Mr. HAWLEY. Will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Certainly; I will always yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HAWLEY. Has not the gentleman just agreed that I have disagreed with the Treasury in some matters involving hundreds of millions of dollars?

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Yes; and I just said that you have done pretty well and I hope you will do better. [Laughter.] You see HAWLEY wanted to approve this.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. RAMSEYER). The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. May I have 5 or 10 minutes by unanimous consent?

The CHAIRMAN. The time has been fixed by the House.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Could the gentleman lend me two minutes?

Mr. WOOD. I will give the gentleman 10 minutes if the House will consent to it.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. I think the Chairman holds the committee can not change the time.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee can not change the time.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Yes; can you let me have two or three minutes?

Mr. WOOD. I will give the gentleman five minutes of my own time.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Thank you. That is very generous, Bill. I tell you, you are opening up and there is hope for you yet, old fellow. [Laughter.]

Now, the Treasury Department through Mr. Bond, communicated on December 20, after this hearing with the joint committee, addressing the letter to Hon. WILLIS C. HAWLEY, chairman of the joint committee, House of Representatives. Among other things he explains the Steel case, and here is what he said:

> The Treasury does not expect the committee to approve the refund. To do so would require it to devote months to exhaustive study of the case.

HAWLEY devoted five hours and wanted to approve it and the Treasury said, "Why, you simpleton, you could not approve it intelligently without months of exhaustive investigation."

Mr. HAWLEY. Will the gentleman quote the words exactly, because I have a remark to make to him on that subject. There is something about "intelligence" there.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. I yield to the gentleman on intelligence at once, so there will be no discussion about that. I am afraid I would get the worst of it on that.

Mr. HAWLEY. And the imputation was as much against the gentleman from Texas as it was myself.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. No; because I did not want to approve it and you did. You were going with the Treasury. I knew it took more information than we had to intelligently approve it.

Mr. HAWLEY. But the gentleman had an opportunity, an official opportunity, to express his disapproval at a time when it would have counted.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Yes; you tried to get me to do that and I declined. I saw the trap. It did not even have any paper over it like the traps they set for ordinary animals, and I said, "No; I will not jump into that trap."

Why, if DAVE REED could not approve this, if the Treasury Department says it would take months of exhaustive investigation to determine the merits of the proposition, are you going to determine it and approve it without that information by voting this appropriation?

I repeat that the highest approval you can possibly give any claim against the United States is approval by making the appropriation by the Congress, and you are proposing to approve all these things I have referred to by making the appropriation of $75,000,000 carried in this bill.

It is a long time that the American people have been coming to this question. It may be that they will forget it. It may be that the newspapers will not give the country a picture of it. I believe that they will give us a square deal. I want the country to understand that a man is in the Treasury Department, sitting across the table, bargaining with taxpayers, settling these claims without law.

Ah, gentlemen! Look at this practically. Supposing the Secretary of the Treasury was a bad man. Let us take out the purity and exalted character that has been pictured of him and reverse the picture and say he was a bad man. What an opportunity! He could say to one corporation "You pay me or I will take you by the neck"; and he could say to another corporation in competition with it, "Come on, I will refund 50 per cent of your taxes." He could also, if he happened to be a politician, which I know the the present Secretary is not—he could if he wanted to build up the greatest political machine in the world, because he would have every taxpayer under his thumb. He could not only raise $6,500,000, which the Republican Party had in the last campaign, but he could raise $10,- 000,000 in as many days, and every cent of it out of the taxpayers' money.

That system is wrong, and I predict that if he administers this office for another four years he will destroy this system because he will destroy the confidence of the American people in the system, and when he does that he will destroy the system. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has again expired.

EXHIBIT No. 1

TAX REFUNDS

Let us see what appropriations the Treasury Department has asked us to make during the fiscal years beginning with 1921, either for refunds in the current fiscal year through deficiency bills or in the succeeding fiscal year in the regular Treasury appropriations:

During the fiscal year 1921 we were asked to appropriate and did appropriate $22,635,000.

During the fiscal year 1922 we were asked to appropriate and did appropriate $67,590,500.

During the fiscal year 1923 we were asked to appropriate and did appropriate $133,105,000.

During the fiscal year 1924 we were asked to appropriate and did appropriate $117,000,000.

During the fiscal year 1925 we were asked to appropriate and did appropriate $150,000,000.

During the fiscal year 1926 we were asked to appropriate and did appropriate $149,250,000.

During the fiscal year 1927 we were asked to appropriate and did appropriate $175,000,000.

During the fiscal year 1928 we were asked to appropriate and did appropriate $173,000,000.

Now, in this fiscal year 1929, there are two appropriations for refunds pending in the total amount of $205,000,000.

From the above figures there can be no doubt as to the tremendous increase in the refundment of taxes. It should also be remembered that this only represents a part of the distributions to taxpayers, for it is probable that the credits which are made against other taxes due are nearly as large as the refunds.

Now, the Treasury told us in October, 1927, that the refunds had reached their peak. At this time before the Ways and Means Committee Mr. Mills estimated 1928 refunds at $151,000,000 and 1929 refunds at $138,000,000. (See hearings before Ways and Means Committee—revenue revision, 1927–28, p. 6.) It can be seen that he was much too low.

The Congress has never had a comprehensive idea of the reason for the enormous increase in refunds. We do know from fragmentary information that the Secretary of the Treasury himself has benefited to a considerable extent from these refunds. I believe it is proper in view of the above to call for the following information:

First. A list of all refunds, credits, and abatements of income, war profits, and excess profits taxes and interest thereon made to the Secretary of the Treasury, Hon. A. W. Mellon, his brothers, sisters, daughters, and cousins, and/or to any corporation in which any of them individually or collectively own any of the corporate stock, and/or to any corporation whose stock is held to any substantial extent by a trust, holding corporation, or other agency, which trust, holding corporation, or other agency is controlled directly or indirectly by the above-mentioned individuals, individually or collectively.

Second. In case the above can not readily be furnished, then the same information is requested where the above-mentioned persons own individually or collectively over 25 per cent of the stock of any corporation to which a refund is made and/or where the stock of the corporation is held to the extent of 25 per cent or more by a trust, holding corporation, or other agency which is in turn controlled by the persons indicated.

PARTIAL REPORT NO. 2 OF DIVISION OF INVESTIGATION ON REFUNDS, CREDITS, AND ABATEMENTS, FEBRUARY 28 TO NOVEMBER 1, 1927

FOREWORD

The urgent deficiency bill (H. R. 16462) approved February 28, 1927, appropriated $175,000,000 for refunding taxes illegally collected, but also provided "That no part of this appropriation shall be available for paying any claims in excess of $75,000 until after the expiration of 60 days from the date upon which a report giving the name of the person to whom the refund is to be made, the amount of the refund, and a summary of the facts and the decision of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue is submitted to the Joint Committee on Internal Revenue Taxation."

The above-quoted law evidently confers no power on the joint committee to formally disapprove refunds, nor, in fact, does it definitely require any positive action by the committee. However, the law does seem to imply that the joint committee will review refunds in excess of $75,000 in order that the Congress may be informed both generally and specifically as to the manner in which the millions of dollars appropriated are expended. It has also seemed proper to bring any doubtful points which developed to the attention of the Treasury Department within the 60-day limit provided in the law.

In conformity with instructions from the chairman of the joint committee, the division of investigation has been charged with the duties of reviewing the overassessments in excess of $75,000 along the lines briefly described in the preceding paragraph. The present report deals with all such overassessments reported by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue to the joint committee from February 28, 1927, to November 1, 1927. Refunds are still being reported and reviewed. November 1 has no significance other than being a convenient date for the purposes of this report.

SYNOPSIS OF GENERAL SURVEY

(For the period February 28, 1927, to November 1, 1927)

1. The total number of cases reported where claims have been allowed in excess of $75,000 amounts to 323.

2. The figures involved in these overassessments are as follows:

Total refunds	$32,627,518.82
Total credits	11,167,099.95
Total abatements	12,032,743.90
Total overassessment	55,827,362.67
Total interest allowed	12,246,811.99
Grand total of allowances	68,074,174.66

3. The amount of the above allowances payable from the appropriation of $175,000,000 is the amount of refunds plus the interest allowed, or the sum of $44,874,330.81.

4. Information from the Treasury Department is to the effect that approximately $122,000,000 of the appropriation had been scheduled for payment up to November 1, 1927. It results from these figures that—

(a) Thirty-seven per cent of the total of the cash refunds is allowed in cases where the refund is in excess of $75,000.

(b) Thirty per cent of the total appropriation was still unencumbered on November 1, 1927.

5. This is the first year since 1921 in which there has been an unencumbered balance in the refund appropriation on November 1. It can be predicted with reasonable certainty that the peak of refundments of tax has been passed.

6. An analysis has been made of the overassessments in excess of $75,000, which shows that the principal reasons for such overassessments are due to the application of provisions in the revenue acts found only in the excess-profits tax years ending with 1921. The percentage of overassessments, due to only three of these provisions in the excess-profits tax years, to the total of all overassessments examined, is shown below:

	Per cent
Special assessment ($13,823,254)	24.76
Invested capital ($8,986,219)	16.10
Amortization ($1,996,875)	3.58
Total ($24,806,348)	44.44

7. Analysis shows that the principal reasons for overassessments due to the application of provisions found in the revenue act of 1926 as well as in prior acts, are as follows:

	Per cent
Estate tax ($5,013,063)	8.98
Affiliation ($4,961,352)	8.89
Depreciation ($4,413,366)	7.91
Inventory adjustments ($4,371,547)	7.83
Valuations ($1,481,765)	2.65
Depletion ($1,410,840)	2.53

8. The facts shown in (6) and (7) above make it apparent that the special assessment and invested capital provisions of the revenue acts of 1921 and prior years are the most troublesome provisions ever written into our revenue acts and are still the cause in 1927 of over 40 per cent of all refunds, credits, and abatements. It is also apparent that the most troublesome provisions in the present revenue act are those necessitating (1) the valuation of estates, (2) the consolidation of returns for affiliated companies, (3) the determination of depreciation and depletion, (4) the valuation of inventories, and (5) valuations for determining gain and loss. It is evident that the future simplification of the revenue act in the larger cases must of necessity rest largely on a more simple or definite method of determining valuations and other questions of judgment.

9. Overassessments for the years prior to 1922 represent 89 per cent of the total overassessments, leaving but 11 per cent of such overassessments allowed for 1922 and subsequent years.

10. When all tax cases prior to 1922 have been settled, refunds, credits, and abatements should be insignificant when compared with the present amount of these allowances.

SYNOPSIS OF INDIVIDUAL CASES

(For the period February 28, 1927, to November 1, 1927)

All overassessments in excess of $75,000 allowed by the commissioner from February 28, 1927, to November 1, 1927, have been reviewed. As previously stated these cases number 323. The results of this review are summarized as follows:

1. Taken as a whole the overassessments submitted by the commissioner to the joint committee show careful, legal, and just handling in the face of many difficult problems.

2. The review of the overassessments is instructive as to the operation and effect of our revenue acts and as to certain inequitable results permitted under such acts.

3. Two hundred and ninety-six cases, or 92 per cent, have been clearly proper and allowable on the basis of the facts shown in the report of the commissioner to the joint committee.

4. Twenty-seven cases, or 8 per cent, have been doubtful on the report of the commissioner and have been specially investigated through the files of the Bureau of Internal Revenue or upon special inquiry addressed to the authorized representative of the Treasury Department.

5. In regard to the 27 doubtful cases, after special investigation, the following classification can be made:

Sixteen cases were found proper.

Nine cases were not computed in accordance with the views of the staff of the committee, but nevertheless were not clearly illegal or outside the discretionary authority vested in the commissioner by the revenue acts.

One case appeared not to be in accordance with current board decisions and was promptly withdrawn for review by the general counsel's office when attention was drawn to this fact by the committee's representative.

One case is awaiting information from the bureau on certain doubtful points.

CONCLUSIONS

From the review of overassessments made it is concluded that—

1. The provisions of the revenue act requiring the use of personal or expert judgment are responsible for many refund cases.

2. The special assessment and invested capital provisions have been exceedingly difficult of administration.

3. The study of the individual cases is valuable as showing the practical operation and effect of our revenue acts and the desirability of simplification.

DISCUSSION

From a consideration of the statistics shown above, and the data in the files of the joint committee, a number of facts can be deducted with reasonable accuracy.

The total number of cases reported in the eight months' period, February 28 to November 1, 1927, has amounted to 323. This represents a monthly average of 40 cases showing an overassessment in excess of $75,000 each. The average overassessment per case amounts to $172,837.03, and the average interest per case amounts to $37,915.83 additional.

While the portion of the overassessments which are payable from the $175,000,000 appropriation consists only of the refunds of $32,627,518.82 plus the interest of $12,246,811.99 or a total of $44,874,330.81, it should be noted that the credits against taxes due amounting to $11,167,099.95 plus the abatements of tax assessed amounting to $12,743.90 or a total of $23,199,843.85, also have a direct effect on the revenue.

Information from the Treasury Department shows that approximately $122,000,000 had been scheduled for payment out of the appropriation up to November 1, 1927. This leaves an unincumbered balance in the appropriation amounting to $53,000,000, or 30 per cent as of the same date. It is also apparent that about 37 per cent of the total of cash refunds and interest can be attributed to cases in excess of $75,000.

A study of the present refunds and the figures of past years would indicate that the peak of refunds has been passed. This is the first year since 1921 in which there has been an unencumbered balance in the refund appropriation on November 1.

Attention is now directed to the "Classification of overassessments in re principal cause," shown on page 6. This table is believed to be very important for the purpose of showing what provisions of the law have been largely responsible for the large refunds already set forth.

At the top of the list stands the special assessment provisions (sec. 210 of the 1917 act, and secs. 327 and 328 of the 1918 and 1919 acts). While these provisions have not been in effect since 1921, they are still the cause of practically one-fourth of all overassessments of tax made in the current year. It appears that the special assessment provisions are perhaps the most difficult sections ever written into the revenue acts from the standpoint of equitable administration. The failure of the Bureau of Internal Revenue to publish definite rules, regulations, and restrictions at the outset has, in our opinion, contributed to increase the past and present difficulties with these provisions. A few scattered decisions and rulings have been published by the bureau and the Board of Tax Appeals and it is believed that the board will eventually formulate a fairly definite policy on this matter. Special assessment will be discussed in detail in connection with certain individual cases presented later.

Next to special assessment comes invested capital, another provision of the revenue act not in effect after 1921. The computation of this item is the principal cause in the allowance of some $10,303,000 in overassessments out of a total of $55,827,000, or 16 per cent. A few of the principal difficulties encountered in the determination of invested capital gives an insight into the complications involved in the application of this section of the Federal income tax laws. Under this section it is necessary to determine the actual cash value of property donated by stockholders, the cash value of tangible and intangible property paid in for stock, the correct amount of depreciation sustained to date of application of the tax laws involving invested capital, and the correct amount of surplus earned for prior years. In addition to the above numerous technical and legal difficulties arise.

Overassessments in the inheritance or estate-tax cases account for 8.98 per cent of the total overassessments reported. An analysis of these cases indicates that the refunds under this section are partly due to the retroactive feature of the 1926 act in regard to reduction of rates. This cause, while standing for this year in third place in importance, will undoubtedly be in a position of less importance in future years. However, the valuation of estates will always present real difficulty under present methods of appraisal.

The fourth important cause of overassessments lies in the application of the consolidated returns provision (sec. 240). This provision, which permits affiliation of companies, is in effect under the revenue act of 1926. Inasmuch as this matter has been fully discussed in a report already submitted to the joint committee and as the House bill as reported by the Ways and Means Committee contains the remedy for this situation, it will not be further commented on here.

The determination of depreciation allowances is the fifth major cause of overassessments. The principal difficulties encountered in these determinations are March 1, 1913, valuations and rates of depreciation. A study is being carried out by the Treasury Department for the purpose of publishing certain authorized rates of depreciation for the various industries. This program has been considered by this division and has its hearty support. A solution to the troublesome question of March 1, 1913, valuations has not yet been found.

Inventory adjustments accounts for some 7.83 per cent of the total overassessments. Here the principal trouble is again an appraisal question, that of the market value of the inventory at a certain date.

Amortization, valuations for determining gain or loss, and depletion account, respectively, for 3.58 per cent, 2.65 per cent, and 2.53 per cent of the total overassessments. All of these questions involve valuations based on judgment.

It must be apparent from the above that, as far as the present revenue act is concerned, the most troublesome questions are found in connection with valuations and matter requiring the use of judgment.

A very large part of current overassessments are, however, made on account of taxes in the excess-profits tax years prior to 1921. In fact, 89 per cent of all the overassessments reported to this committee apply to taxable years prior to 1922. It should certainly follow that refunds should be very much less after the final closing out of the tax returns for the above-mentioned period.

INDIVIDUAL CASES

A comprehensive idea of the situation in regard to refunds, credits, and abatements can not be secured without a brief description of certain individual cases. Accordingly a brief description of the principal points involved in certain interesting cases will be given. These descriptions are all based on actual cases submitted to the joint committee by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue. As some of these cases concern nationally known taxpayers, it has been thought wise to substitute fictitious names for the real names, so that the facts can be studied without bias or prejudice. In every case, therefore, whether in the discussion or in quoted exhibits, the real name of the taxpayer has been changed to a code name.

This report will frankly criticize certain features in some of the individual cases, but it is hoped that the reader will keep in mind that there are two sides to most of these questions and that there are many border-line cases where it is impossible to justly determine all the doubtful points in favor of the taxpayer or in favor of the Government. Taken as a whole, the overassessments submitted by the commissioner are obviously proper on the basis of the facts shown.

A careful review has been made of all the 323 cases submitted up to November 1, 1927, and of these only 27 cases, or 8 per cent, have appeared sufficiently doubtful to require special investigation in the files of the bureau. Over one-half of these 27 cases appeared proper after intensive study.

There remains only 11 doubtful cases, which can be classified as follows:

Nine cases are not computed in accordance with the views of this division, but, nevertheless, they are not clearly illegal or outside the discretionary authority vested in the commissioner by the revenue acts.

One case appears not to be in accordance with current Board of Tax Appeals decisions and was promptly withdrawn for review by the general counsel's office when attention was drawn to this fact by the committee's representative.

One case is awaiting information from the bureau on doubtful points of fact.

The description and discussion of certain individual cases will now be presented:

Case No. 1

Code name: John Doe & Co. (Inc).

Figures involved:

Total original and additional assessment	$142,558.71
Final tax determined	26,297.88
Overassessment	116,260.83
Refunded	116,260.83
Interest allowed	38,148.52

Subject: Interest.

DISCUSSION

The recommendation of the General Counsel of the Bureau of Internal Revenue in this case will be found in Exhibit 1a attached.

From an examination of this recommendation and other data it appears that John Doe was the principal stockholder in John Doe & Co. (Inc.). This company erroneously included in its income the sum of approximately $226,408 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, which should have been returned by Mr. Doe as an individual. This change in the allocation of income requires a refund to the corporation and the assessment of additional tax on the individual. There is also an inventory adjustment in favor of the corporation in the amount of $111,926.

The refund to the corporation amounts to $116,260.83. It may be roughly computed, on account of the two major adjustments noted, that about two-thirds, or $73,000, of the total refund is due to the allocation of income to the individual. The additional tax proposed against Mr. Doe amounts to $70,381, so that the net result to the Government is unimportant.

The action of the commissioner in this case appears strictly in accordance with the law. It is desired, however, to point out the disadvantage suffered by the Government in adjustments of this character.

Due to the mere reallocation of income from the corporation to the individual owner of same, the Government takes a heavy loss on account of the interest provisions of the revenue acts. The corporation receives interest from the time of filing its return in 1920; the taxpayer will pay interest on account of the additional assessment only from October 26, 1926. The advantage to the taxpayer is approximately $22,000 in interest.

The facts in regard to this situation are clearly stated in the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury to the chairman of this committee, quoted in full below:

APRIL 29, 1927.

Hon. W. R. GREEN,

Chairman Joint Committee on Internal Revenue Taxation.

Attention: Mr. L. H. Parker, Chief, Division of Investigation, room 321–A, House Office Building.

SIR: Reference is made to your letter dated April 30, 1927, in which you request that you be informed as to the amount of additional assessment made against Mr. John Doe on account of the reallocation of income returned by and taxed to John Doe & Co. (Inc.) for the year 1920 to Mr. John Doe, which reallocation of income resulted in a refund of $116,260.83 to the corporation. There is to be paid on this refund an amount of interest in the total sum of $38,148.52.

On account of this change, tax has been proposed against Mr. John Doe in the sum of $70,381.71. This tax results to Mr. Doe as a consequence of the reallocation of the income to his account.

The taxpayer has filed a petition with the United States Board of Tax Appeals on the basis of what appear to be immaterial issues, and the tax has not yet been assessed. When the United States Board of Tax Appeals renders its decision the proper tax will be assessed and interest computed from February 26, 1926, to the date of assessment.

Respectfully,

A. W. MELLON,
Secretary of the Treasury.

CONCLUSION

It is the opinion of this division that the refund allowed in case No. 1 is correct on the basis of the facts submitted. It is thought proper to bring out the inequity of the Government as to interest payments resulting in such cases from our present statutes.

Case No. 2

Code name: Roe & Roe (a partnership).

Figures involved: Additional interest allowance on prior credit, $12,697.61.

Subject: Interest.

DISCUSSION

The recommendation of the general counsel in this case is shown in Exhibit 2b, attached.

It appears that there was a certificate of overassessment issued to the partnership, Roe & Roe, for the taxable year 1917 in the amount of $60,014.96. Of this amount a certain portion was refunded to the partnership and a small amount abated. The balance, which amounted to $28,476.84, was credited against the additional tax due from the partners, John Roe and James Roe, with their consent.

On the refund interest was paid from April 1, 1918, the date of overpayment, to December 3, 1925, the date of allowance of refund. There is no controversy about this interest on the amount refunded.

On the credit interest was originally paid from April 1, 1918, the date of overpayment, to June 15, 1918, the due date of the amount against which credit was taken. The taxpayer contended that this interest period was erroneous and that interest should be paid from April 1, 1918, the date of overpayment, to December 3, 1925, the date of allowance of the credit.

As the unit did not agree with the taxpayer's contention the taxpayer filed suit in the United States Court of Claims for payment of interest for the period stated.

The Attorney General, at the request of the general counsel, settled this case out of court by admitting liability for interest on the amounts credited the partners for the period April 1, 1918, to December 3, 1925, as claimed by the taxpayer.

The action taken in this case appears to be proper and in conformity with the law. It appears, however, that neither before nor after this action has the Bureau of Internal Revenue followed the precedent established. This is shown by the letter of the Treasury Department quoted in full below:

OCTOBER 12, 1927.

Mr. L. H. PARKER,
Chief Division of Investigation,
Joint Committee on Internal Revenue Taxation,
Room 321 A, House Office Building, City.

DEAR MR. PARKER: Reference is made to your letter of September 30, 1927, relative to the proposed payment of interest to Roe & Roe, as shown on schedule 2, in which you suggest that Mr. Sherwood's attention be drawn to the memorandum of the general counsel in this case and that you be informed whether this decision of the general counsel is being followed by his division.

You are advised that an agreement was reached between the taxpayer and the Attorney General in this case, as a result of which the taxpayer filed with the Attorney General in escrow a motion to dismiss its suit for interest in the United States Court of Claims. The Income Tax Unit was directed to reopen and allow the claim for interest. The memorandum of the general counsel in this case has not been adopted as a general policy.

Very truly yours, E. C. ALVORD,
Special Assistant to the Secretary of the Treasury.

It is not clear to this division why a policy which admittedly can not be sustained by legal action should be continued in force. The result of such procedure is to deny all taxpayers their statutory rights except those who file suit.

CONCLUSION

It appears that case No. 2 has been settled properly on the basis of the facts submitted. The question is raised, however, as to why the case should not be followed as a precedent for all taxpayers whose cases involve the same principle.

Case No. 3

Code name: The "A" Iron Products Co.

Figures involved:

Total of original assessment	$1,136,598.53
Final tax as now determined	1,074,175.29
Overassessment allowed	62,423.24
Amount refunded	62,423.24
Interest paid	17,975.33
Total allowance	80,398.57

Subject: Special assessment.

DISCUSSION

The recommendation of the general counsel to the commissioner in regard to this case will be found in Exhibit 3 of the appendix.

The "A" Iron Products Co. is by far the largest manufacturer of certain iron products in the United States. The company filed its original return for 1920, admitting a tax liability of $1,136,598.53. After a field examination, an additional tax liability of $37,992.52 was disclosed, but was not assessed, as the taxpayer filed a claim for special assessment for the year 1920 under the provisions of sections 327 and 328 of the revenue act of 1918. This claim was allowed and a refund of $62,423.24 resulted.

The refund in this case is due entirely to the application of the special assessment provisions above mentioned. The reason given for special assessment is that there has been "an understatement of assets" on the books of the taxpayer "due to the fact that large sums expended on additions, replacements, and other capital items were charged to expense in prior years."

It appears that this is a proper ground for special assessment when properly substantiated, and when it is not possible to actually restore such items to capital. It would appear more proper, however, in cases where the items could be identified to restore them to capital rather than to allow special assessment. Such facts can only be secured by the examination of the taxpayers' books, and this division therefore accepts the facts as stated in the general counsel's memorandum. It is certain that this ground for granting special assessment should be handled carefully for almost any company which has kept its books on a conservative basis can prove that many items should have been capitalized. For instance, it is believed the United States Steel Corporation could prove this fact.

Having admitted that special assessment is allowable, the bureau is next confronted with the problem of selecting proper comparatives. Inasmuch as the "A" Iron Products Co. is the largest company in this line of business, it has been impossible for the Income Tax Unit to follow its usual practice and select comparatives of the same size.

The following data from the files of the bureau shows the gross sales, net income, and percentage of profits tax to net income for the appellant company and the comparatives finally selected.

Extract from comparative data sheet

	Gross sales	Net income	Per cent profit tax to net income
Appellant	$12,444,841	$3,213,796	30.30
Comparative No. 1	2,008,030	425,629	21.70
Comparative No. 2	1,119,635	367,229	30.95
Comparative No. 3	936,160	176,236	26.19
Comparative No. 4	1,140,965	244,487	21.41
Comparative No. 5	1,711,404	291,237	26.79
Comparative No. 6	1,067,425	232,857	28.15
Average	1,330,603	289,613	25.79

Final profits tax, appellant	$836,733.45
Per cent of final tax to net income, appellant	26.04
Constructed invested capital, appellant	8,003,302.89

The above statistics show that the gross sales or net income of all six comparatives added together does not equal respectively the gross sales or net income of the appellant company. The comparatives chosen are therefore individually grossly disproportionate in size to the taxpayer company. The law, however, does not seem to specifically require the use of the same size companies as comparatives. This point, however, should be noted, as we shall see in a later case that the bureau insists on comparatives of the same size.

One of the practical points which stands out in this case is that special assessment is granted to a company which is by far the largest producer in its particular line. It is not apparent the Congress intended to give this relief to these large companies. If the principles established in this case are correct there seems to be no doubt that the United States Steel Corporation could be allowed special assessment, for this corporation was in the 80 per cent bracket in 1918 and had kept its books on a very conservative basis in regard to capitalization.

There are two other points which should be noted in this case:

In the first place, the reduction in tax through special assessment is about 9 per cent. It is not certain from the published regulations of the commissioner that this constitutes a "gross disproportion between the tax computed without benefit of this section and the tax computed by reference to representative corporations" as required by section 327 of the revenue act of 1918.

In the second place, the taxpayer had the benefit of substantial deductions for amortization and depletion. None of the comparative companies had these deductions showing that they were not "similarly circumstanced" in regard to their business. Amortization indicates the taxpayer had war contracts or contracts contributing to the prosecution of the war; depletion shows the taxpayer owned or operated mines.

CONCLUSION

This case is one of those not computed in accordance with the views of this division, but on the other hand it is admitted that there is nothing illegal in the determination made. It is admitted, also, that in the absence of definite rules, the specific application of the special assessment provision is largely discretionary with the commissioner.

DISCUSSION

On August 9, 1927, the following quoted letter was transmitted to the authorized representative of the Treasury Department. This letter sets forth the opinion of this division after a review of the case and is sufficient for the purposes of this report. It should be noted that actual names have been omitted in all cases and code numbers or letters substituted therefor.

AUGUST 9, 1927.

Mr. E. C. ALVORD,
Special Assistant to the Secretary of the Treasury,
Washington, D. C.

Subject: Refund—"X" Tobacco Co.

MY DEAR MR. ALVORD: The Commissioner of Internal Revenue, on June 27, 1927, submitted to the chairman of this committee the facts in connection with the refund proposed to the "X" Tobacco Co., in accordance with H. R. 16462, requiring such report.

As per my general instructions covering all such cases I have made an investigation of the principal points at issue in this case, and not being in agreement with the findings of the bureau, the matter is referred to you with a request for a conference on this case on August 18 at 1.30 p. m., with such officers of the department as you may designate.

The figures involved in this case are as follows, covering the years 1918 to 1921, inclusive:

Total original and additional assessments	$24,475,876.63
Previously refunded and credited	1,698,265.47
Balance	22,777,611.16
Tax liability now determined	15,149,597.91
Overassessment proposed	7,628,013.25

Of this overassessment now proposed $4,072,685.83 is to be refunded and $3,555,327.42 is to be credited against 1923 taxes; in addition to this refund and credit, there will be due the taxpayer on this adjustment an interest payment of $2,141,122.18.

The determination of the final tax liability in this case has been arrived at by the application of the "special assessment provisions" sections 327 and 328 of the revenue acts of 1918 and 1921. The method employed is fully outlined in the recommendation of the general counsel to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue dated June 7, 1927, a copy of which is attached to this report. (See Exhibit A.")

The points in this case with which we take issue are as follows:

1. The holding that an abnormality exists in invested capital from the failure of the taxpayer to capitalize advertising expenses when at the same time it is held that "a satisfactory rule or formula" for capitalizing such expenses "has never been devised."

2. The determination of tax liability by "special assessment" by the use of only one comparative company.

3. The holding that legislative history is the controlling factor in granting special assessment in this case.

1. ABNORMALITY CLAIMED IN INVESTED CAPITAL

The general counsel sets forth in his memorandum (Exhibit "A") the total advertising and allied expenditures of the "X" Tobacco Co. from 1899 to 1921, which can be summarized as follows:

	Total advertising expenditures
1899 to 1911, inclusive	$7,062,542.51
1912 to 1917, inclusive	8,179,684.69
1918 to 1921, inclusive	22,060,884.79
Grand total	37,303,111.99

The general counsel states that "if a cause for special assessment exists it is (1) because the taxpayer employed in its business during the years under consideration valuable income-producing intangible assets which had been acquired through large expenditures in advertising but which are excluded from invested capital computed under section 326 of the revenue act of 1918, and (2) because of the legislative history of this particular case."

In our opinion there is nothing in section 326 which prohibits the capitalization of advertising expenses and its inclusion in paid-in surplus and in invested capital. However, the general counsel says that "a satisfactory rule or formula for obtaining the amount (of such expenditures) which should be apportioned to capital and the amount which should be apportioned to profit and loss has never been devised."

If this is the case, how can there be an abnormality in the invested capital of the "X" Tobacco Co. as required by section 327, through the failure to capitalize advertising expenses when there is no method in existence for this or any other company to capitalize such expenses? Noncapitalization of advertising expense must be the normal not the abnormal method of handling advertising expenditures.

Even if we grant that there is an abnormality on account of these advertising expenses, the relief afforded far exceeds what could be obtained under any method of capitalization of the advertising expenditures.

Suppose we allow advertising expenditures to be capitalized in full for all years, then the result would be approximately as follows:

Year	Approximate invested capital. All advertising capitalized	Statutory invested capital	Constructive invested capital as determined by special assessment
1918	$67,373,601	$52,131,384	$121,194,911
1919	61,022,116	65,215,929	144,437,216
1920	101,091,270	79,233,744	133,708,188
1921	109,965,289	81,406,904	169,999,324

From the above it can be seen that even if all advertising expenses were capitalized, the resulting invested capital would fall far short of that in fact allowed by the bureau under the special assessment provision. Not only that for the years 1918 to 1921 the taxpayers' income would be increased by the amount of such capitalized items, or the sum of $22,060,884.99.

It can readily be seen, therefore, that the taxpayer instead of suffering "an exceptional hardship" by the noncapitalization of such items as required by section 327, has in fact secured an advantage through the deduction of the items in full as an expense.

This method of allowing special assessment on account of an abnormality in not capitalizing expenditures, which expenditures are charged off in full as an expense for the taxable years in question, amounts to allowing such items both as an increase in capital and at the same time as a complete charge off from income. This method can not be approved of, and this case, if typical of the method employed by the special assessment section, becomes of general importance. To give the taxpayer this double advantage is obviously at variance with the whole intent of the law.

Probably the best method for the taxpayer would be to capitalize all advertising expenses up to January 1, 1918, and after that date charge same to expense. This method gives the following comparative results:

Year	Approximate invested capital. Advertising up to 1918 capitalized	Statutory invested capital	Constructive invested capital as determined by special assessment
1918	$67,373,607	$52,131,384	$121,194,911
1919	80,458,156	65,215,929	144,437,216
1920	94,475,971	79,233,744	133,708,188
1921	96,649,131	81,406,904	169,999,324

It will be seen from the above that even under this method, most advantageous to the taxpayer, the invested capital falls far below that determined under special assessment by the bureau.

It is our position that in any event the constructive invested capital determined under special assessment should not exceed the figures shown in column 1 of the above table, as such figures give effect to the full extent of the abnormality.

2. USE OF ONE COMPARATIVE

Section 328 provides that the tax determined under special assessment shall bear "the same ratio to the net income of the taxpayer for the taxable year, as the average tax of representative corporations engaged in a like or similar trade or business bears to their average net income."

Reference to any standard dictionary will show that it is impossible to obtain an average by the use of only one comparative company. This method appears at least technically illegal.

As we understand the position of the bureau, they adopt this method because there is only one company which they consider a proper comparative.

In the case of the refund recently allowed the "A" Iron Products Co. six comparatives were selected, all of whose net income added together did not equal the net income of the appellant company.

It is evident, therefore, that the same size of company is not required by the rules of the special-assessment section.

Data secured sometime ago from the special assessment section shows that there are many small tobacco companies who paid a higher excess-profits tax rate than is now found for the "X" Tobacco Co.

A summary of these comparatives follows:

1918

Name	Net income	Profits tax	Per cent profits tax to net income
Company No. 1	$29,531	$12,725	43.09
Company No. 2	245,293	101,659	41.44

Total	895,456	110,943	12.38

Of course, it can not be contended that all of the above comparatives are similarly circumstanced with the "X" Tobacco Co., the fact does remain that they are more or less in competition with it. A comparison of the average rates paid by these comparative companies against the rates now proposed for the "X" Tobacco Co. is as follows:

Year	Statutory rate "X" Tobacco Co.	Rate now allowed by bureau	Average rate shown by our comparatives
	Per cent	Per cent	Per cent
1918	50.37	26.09	41.86
1919	18.1	6.16	14.78
1920	11	4.67	12.38

There can be no doubt, therefore, that the "X" Tobacco Co. will under the proposed rates pay less than one-half of the profits-tax rate that many of its small competitors have been obliged to pay.

It would appear that if the bureau can disregard the size of comparatives in the case of the "A" Iron Products Co., that they could employ the same method in this case and use smaller comparatives.

Why a relief provision like special assessment should find a higher rate of tax for small companies than for large is not clear and does not seem to come within the intent of the Congress as expressed by the statute.

It is understood that rates have been determined under special assessment as follows for certain small tobacco companies:

APPELLANT COMPANY

	Per cent
No. 1 Tobaccco Co. allowed profits-tax rate of	31.5
No. 2 Tobacco Co. allowed profits-tax rate of	38.03
No. 3 Tobacco Co. denied relief on rate of	40.96

No. 4 Tobacco Co. allowed rate of	8.75
No. 5 Tobacco Co. denied relief on rate of	18.90

The memorandum of the general counsel goes into considerable detail as to the three other companies besides the "X" Tobacco Co., which dominate the tobacco business, namely:

The "M" Tobacco Co.

The "R" Tobacco Co.

The "S" Tobacco Co.

We have made a study of the statistics on those companies as published in Moody's Analysis of Industrials, which is interesting but too voluminous for reproduction here.

It might be mentioned, however, that if the "S" Tobacco Co. is granted special assessment on the argument advanced in this case they will of necessity also be compared with one company, the "R" Tobacco Co.

Now, the ground for special assessment in the "S" Tobacco Co. case is an excessive amount of borrowed capital. Yet the "R" Tobacco Co. appears to have a greater proportionate amount of borrowed capital than the "S" Tobacco Co. What will be done in such a situation is hard to see unless small comparatives are resorted to.

In regard to the "M" Tobacco Co. it is evident that the capital requirements of this company are quite different from the "X" Tobacco Co. The "M" Tobacco Co. manufactures large quantities of cigars and controls domestic and foreign subsidiaries which doubtless require more capital on the part of the parent company.

It might also be noted that all of the Big Four companies except the "X" Tobacco Co. have a large amount of bonded indebtedness showing an entirely different situation as to the capital necessary.

3. LEGISLATIVE HISTORY

It appears that the legislative history of this particular case is the controlling factor in allowing special assessment.

In other words, unless this company had been mentioned in the Finance Committee of the Senate as a typical case where special assessment was necessary, then this case would not have been allowed.

This means either that the bureau has failed to interpret this section of the act as intended by the Congress or that the act does not express the intent.

The fact remains that in this case, no other company similarly circumstanced with the "X" Tobacco Co. could get special assessment unless it too had been mentioned in a committee of the Congress or in that body itself.

We can not believe that the Congress intended to disregard in this way the fundamental principle underlying the excess-profits tax; namely, the taxation at special rates, of the profit accruing to corporations in excess of 8 per cent of its actual paid-in capital and paid-in surplus.

The fact remains that the other three of the "Big Four" tobacco companies had on the books large amounts of good will paid in for cash. These stockholders were entitled to their 8 per cent dividends before the payment of an excess-profits tax.

In the case of the "X" Tobacco Co., no such good will was paid for in cash, and it results that the stockholders could still get their 8 per cent dividend before being affected by the excess-profits tax.

We do not believe that the Congress in enacting sections 327 and 328 had in mind passing on the merits of all the facts in the "X" Tobacco Co. case, nor to hold the bureau to granting special assessment to this company, if they could not grant a similar relief to companies similarly situated which had not been mentioned by Members of the Congress.

When the 1918 revenue act first passed the Senate it included among the cases entitled to special assessment those which suffered a hardship "because of the time or manner of organization, or because the actual value of the assets on March 1, 1913, was substantially in excess of the amount at which such assets would be valued for the purpose of computing invested capital * * *."

This language was not in the House bill and was stricken out in conference. The general counsel's memorandum fails to show that the discussion in the Finance Committee was on the final revenue act as passed by both Houses, or merely in the act as first passed by the Senate.

The "X" Tobacco Co. case is clearly one where the time and manner of organization is substantially different from the other members of the "Big Four" group. But this ground for special assessment was clearly eliminated in the final bill as passed by both Houses.

A discussion of the above points is requested in conference, in order that this committee may fulfill the obligation laid on it by H. R. 16462, the urgent deficiency bill.

Very truly yours,

L. H. PARKER,
Chief Division of Investigation.

Following the above letter, conference was had with the party designated by the Treasury Department and the various issues raised were discussed. Information was given that the use of one comparative had been found legal after investigation by the general counsel's office. The representative of the Treasury Department took the position that the determination was the most favorable to be had in view of the peculiar circumstances of the case.

This division concluded that its duty had been performed by calling the main issues to the attention of the department.

CONCLUSION

This case is one where, in the opinion of this division, special assessment should not have been allowed. It is conceded, however, that it was within the discretionary power of the commissioner to grant special assessment in this case. This is a good sample of the extreme difficulty in the determination of tax under these provisions, and the magnitude of this overassessment shows its very great importance.

Case No. 5

Code name: The "B" Rubber Co.
Figures involved:

Original assessment	$614,768.27
Final tax liability	476,340.02
Overassessment	138,428.25
Refunded	138,428.25
Interest	51,072.44
Total allowance	189,500.69

Subject: Special assessment.

DISCUSSION

The refund in this case is due to the application of the special-assessment provisions of the 1918 revenue act to the determination of tax for the year 1919.

The grounds for special assessment are two in number and both appear proper. These grounds are stated by the general counsel as follows:

1. "Where there are excluded from invested capital computed under section 326, intangible assets of recognized value and substantial in amount, built up or developed by the taxpayer."

2. "Borrowed capital": During the taxable year, the company had $1,172,000 in borrowed capital, or approximately one-half of the amount of the statutory invested capital.

In regard to the selection of comparatives, the report of the corporation auditor for this committee states as follows:

"It is the practice of the unit in a consolidated case where the companies are engaged in a somewhat different line of business to select comparatives representative of each industry in which the class of products fall. This has been done in the above-named taxpayer's case as will be noted by reference to the data sheet attached. Some of the comparatives represent manufacture of hard rubber while Company No. 2 is engaged in the manufacture of asbestos. After going over in detail with the auditor the data sheet attached hereto and examining the cases selected it would appear that the comparatives used are the best that could be obtained."

CONCLUSION

This division believes that the determination in this case is proper and in conformity with the law. It is submitted in order to make plain that certain cases clearly fall within the intent of Congress in enacting the special-assessment provisions.

Case No. 6

Code name: The Produce Co.

Total original assessment (1922 and 1923)	$112,000.85
Final tax determined	None.

Total allowance	131,525.20

Subject: Depreciation—Discussion.

The recommendation of the general counsel to the commissioner is shown in Exhibit 4 of the appendix.

It appears that on the original returns of the taxpayer for the years 1922 and 1923 depreciation was not computed on a proper basis and a new basis was set up on amended returns. The amounts originally claimed for depreciation and the amounts as revised on the amended returns are shown below:

Year	Depreciation taken on original returns	Depreciation claimed on amended returns
1922	$238,423.98	$627,082.56
1923	241,651.47	639,926.19

The bureau found the depreciation claimed on the amended returns proper.

The determination of depreciation is fundamentally a question of fact. This division could not properly comment on the determination of fact without a field examination. In view of the large change made in the depreciation, the rates allowed were examined and found to be as follows:

	Per cent
Buildings	3
Machinery	5

These rates appear reasonable. It should be noted, however, that repairs were deducted from income in these years as shown below:

1922	$726,640.10
1923	938,575.72

How far such repairs had the effect of increasing the life of the plant is not determinate from the record. In fact, this is a general problem which has never been satisfactorily solved, but which should be studied in view of the very great deductions taken in arriving at net taxable income on account of depreciation and repairs.

CONCLUSIONS

It is conceded that the allowance made in this case is proper on the basis of the facts shown in the record and accepted by the bureau. The importance of depreciation deductions should be specially noted.

Case No. 7

Code name: The "C" Oil Co.

Interest	255,440.00
Total allowance	955,446.74

Subject: Depletion.

DISCUSSION

The recommendation of the general counsel to the commissioner in regard to this case is shown in Exhibit 5 of the appendix.

The principal issue in this case is the determination of the depletion allowance on oil wells. The depletion allowances claimed and allowed are shown in the following table:

Year	Oil depletion claimed by taxpayer	Oil depletion originally allowed by bureau	Oil depletion finally allowed
1918	$5,515,464.07	$2,779,079.91	$4,392,782.54
1919	37,214,875.18	9,744,761.59	11,033,320.11

The procedure in this case was unusual. The taxpayer filed suit in the Court of Claims for about $2,000,000. The case was compromised out of court for $700,000. Then a valuation was set up by the engineering division which would make the statutory tax agree with the amount of the compromise.

Such a method of fixing the tax and then working back to a valuation from the tax, is, in general, condemned. However, investigation showed that the valuation made was based on reasonable and proper factors and that the engineer making the valuation was satisfied that the value found was conservative.

CONCLUSION

It is probable the refund made in this case was for the best interests of the Government and that a larger refund would have resulted if the case had been carried through the court. The fact must be faced, however, that as long as the tax is based in these cases on the determination of valuations which vary by as much as 400 per cent according to the views of different experts, then just so long will compromises be necessary in these cases.

Subject: Invested capital.

DISCUSSION

The principal reason for the overassessment in this case is the adjustment of invested capital. The case is very voluminous and has been carefully reviewed; it is believed that on the basis of the facts admitted by the bureau the adjustment is proper.

The increase in invested capital amounting to approximately $36,000,000 is due largely to the valuation of tangibles and intangibles of predecessor companies acquired by the taxpayer at the time of incorporation. These valuations were based on certain facts which could only be verified by a field investigation. The legal action of the bureau appears to have been proper.

CONCLUSION

This case is illustrative of the great difficulty which is experienced with invested capital computations. A full discussion of all the various points involved would be too voluminous for the purposes of this report.

It is pointed out that one of the principal troubles is due once more to questions of judgment in the matter of valuations.

Subject: Red Cross contribution.

DISCUSSION

The principal reason for the refund in this case is the deduction from income of State franchise and Federal capital-stock tax accrued. The only point, however, which will be discussed is the allowance as a necessary expense deductible from income of a contribution to the American Red Cross in 1917.

The recommendtion of the general council to the commissioner states in part as follows:

"The first item is the allowance of a Red Cross donation in the amount of $90,100. During this year the taxpayer made a contribution to the American Red Cross in the amount of $100,100. The taxpayer contends that it would have in any event contributed to the Red Cross during this year but would not have given in excess of $10,000, except for the reason that the taxpayer was the principal depositary of the American Red Cross and had been such for some time prior to 1917. The average balance of the deposit of the American Red Cross with the taxpayer for the period from June, 1917, to June, 1918, was $7,446,000. The bank paid interest at the rate of 3 per cent on this deposit to secure a much higher rate of return through reinvestment.

It was held in Treasury Decision 2847 that corporations are not entitled to deduct from gross income the amount of contributions to religious, charitable, scientific, or educational corporations or associations even though such contributions may be made to the Red Cross or other war activities. The taxpayer takes the position, however, that the amount of $90,100, being the amount of its donation in excess of a fair ordinary contribution, should not be classified as a contribution but as an ordinary and necessary business expense. The taxpayer relies upon the provisions of article 562 of Regulations 45, providing that "donations which ultimately represent a consideration for a benefit flowing directly to the corporation as an incident of its business will be deductions from gross income." In appeal of Anniston City Land Co. (2 B. T. A. 526) a contribution by a corporation engaged in the business of land sales, made to the Chamber of Commerce of Anniston, was allowed as a deduction. The board said, "It is difficult to imagine an expenditure which would have stimulated demand as did this contribution. Such a contribution has, in a direct sense, a reasonable relation to the taxpayer's business." In the appeal of Citizens Trust Co. of Utica (2 B. T. A. 1239), a contribution by the taxpayer to the Oneida County Farm Bureau was allowed as a deduction upon the finding that it was an ordinary and necessary expense of the business. The facts herein bring the case within the provisions of the regulations and the application thereof made by the Board of Tax Appeals. Accordingly the deduction of $90,100 may be allowed."

This division was not convinced by the above reasoning and drew this item to the attention of the bureau. It is believed that the bureau did not change their position.

Treasury Decision No. 2847 states in part as follows:

"The Attorney General, in an opinion dated May 19, 1919, states the view that ordinary and necessary expenses contemplated by paragraph 1 of sections 214 and 234 were not intended to include all necessary expenses, because the two immediately succeeding paragraphs provide for deducting interest and taxes, both of which are necessary expenses; also the provision in regard to allowance for salaries, compensation, rentals, etc., indicates that all of the expenses which are contemplated under the terms used in paragraph 1 of these sections are expenses incurred directly in the maintenance and operation of the business, and not all those which may be beneficial and even necessary in the broader sense.

"In addition to the above considerations and to the fact that there is express provision for deducting contributions or gifts in the case of individuals, which is wanting in the section providing for deductions to be made by corporations, reference to the legislative history of the revenue act of 1918 (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for September 17, 1918) shows that an amendment providing that corporations might make deductions of contributions or gifts, as in the case of individuals, came to a vote and was defeated, the principal reason assigned in the debate being that it would be dangerous to authorize directors to be generous with the money of their stockholders even for such laudable purposes.

"Corporations are therefore not entitled to deduct from their gross income for the purposes of the income tax the amount of contributions made to religious, charitable, scientific, or educational corporations or associations, even though such contributions are made to the Red Cross or other war activities."

It can be seen from the above quotation that under published decisions contributions by corporations to the Red Cross are not deductible from income even though such contributions "may be beneficial and even necessary in the broader sense."

CONCLUSION

This is a case where in the opinion of this division one of the issues has been decided in a manner not in accordance with existing decisions. It appears that the legal advice of the bureau is contrary to our opinion.

Case No. 10

Code name: The "D" Railroad Co.

Subject: Affiliation.

DISCUSSION

The "D" Railroad Co. was affiliated with the "Universal" Steel Co. for 1917 and subsequent years. The refund allowed in this case is not due primarily to affiliation but nevertheless this question is involved. The refund is made as a result of the application of section 284 (c) of the revenue act of 1926, which provides as follows:

"If the invested capital of a taxpayer is decreased by the commissioner, and such decrease is due to the fact that the taxpayer failed to take adequate deductions in previous years, with the result that there has been an overpayment of income, war-profits, or excess-profits taxes in any previous year or years, then the amount of such overpayment shall be credited or refunded, without the filing of a claim therefor, notwithstanding the period of limitation provided for in subdivision (b) or (g) has expired."

The only question that will be discussed in this case is the question which has caused much of the trouble in the case of the consolidated returns of affiliated companies, and which can be stated as follows:

Does the consolidated-returns provision create a new taxable status that is "one economic unit" for tax purposes, or does each corporation in the affiliated group retain its individual entity as a taxpayer?

The United States Board of Tax Appeals states as follows in the Farmers Deposit National Bank case (5 B. T. A. 527):

"On the other hand, it said, plainly enough we think, in section 240 (a) of the revenue act of 1918, that the generally recognized principle of corporate identity was to be overridden for the purpose of the income and profits taxes; that the separate existences of the affiliated companies ceased for tax purposes. It created out of two or more affiliated companies, otherwise having separate identities, a new tax status; and when it did so Congress intended that the group should have the attributes of a single taxpayer. And where, in other sections of the statute, Congress speaks of corporations as individual taxpayers, it means as to the sections dealing with consolidated units to treat the consolidated unit as a single corporation."

If this view is correct and the opinion seems decidedly broad, then it does not appear that in the case of the "D" Railroad Co. its taxes for 1909 to 1916 should be effected by adjustments in the invested capital of an affiliated group which had a "new tax status" and was treated as a "single corporation."

However, Mr. Nash, assistant to the commissioner, states in a letter to this division, as follows:

"'Taxpayer' is defined in section 2 (a) (9), Part IV of the revenue act of 1926 as 'any person subject to a tax imposed by this act,' while 'person' is defined in section 2 (a) (1), Part IV of the same act as 'an individual, a trust or estate, a partnership, or a corporation.' When corporations become affiliated for tax purposes under the provisions of section 240 of the various revenue acts they are required to file a consolidated return on Form 1120 and in addition separate returns on Form 1122. Each affiliated company is specifically made subject to tax under the provisions of section 240 and being subject to tax must be regarded as a taxpayer within the meaning of section 2 (a) (9), supra."

CONCLUSION

The opinion of this division is in agreement with the statement of Mr. Nash on the point discussed. It is important to note that the application of the so-called "economic unity theory" as advanced by the board is in conflict with the "separate entity theory" long practiced by the bureau and it is one of the factors in the difficulty experienced in the administration of the consolidated-returns provision.

Case No. 11

Code name: Estate of John Moe.

Figures involved:
Total tax paid	$833,018.79
Final tax determined	679,085.50
Amount of refund	143,933.29
Interest	26,770.93
Total allowance	170,704.22

Subject: Estate tax.

DISCUSSION

The recommendation of the general counsel to the commissioner in regard to the case is shown in Exhibit 6 of the appendix.

It appears that John Moe owned at the time of his death an eight-ninths interest in John Moe & Co., a partnership. This partnership held bonds (or notes) of the "X" Motor Truck Co., having a book cost of $1,382,173.43.

John Moe died on May 31, 1922. At this time the "X" Motor Truck Co. was in operation but was losing money. In December, 1922, the "X" Motor Truck Co. went into the hands of a receiver.

The estate tax division valued the bonds (or notes) above referred to at $750,000 in their original determination of the tax.

The estate in support of a claim for refund, made affidavit that the bonds (or notes) had been sold during liquidation by court order for $1,000. This affidavit was accepted by the estate tax division and this decrease in value from $750,000 to $1,000 is the principal cause for the refund in this case.

An investigation made by this office showed that the assets of the "X" Motor Truck Co. were sold at receiver's sale on November 23, 1925.

It appeared probable that a certain beneficiary of the estate bought the bonds referred to for $1,000, and that on sale of assets such beneficiary might have received a substantial amount for same. The Treasury Department agreed to check this point up in the field to see that any difference between the $1,000 and the amount received should be included in taxable income.

CONCLUSION

This case is illustrative of the difficulty often encountered in valuation of securities for estate-tax purposes.

Total allowance	487,671.84

Subject: Inventory adjustments.

DISCUSSION

The refund in this case is due principally to the reduction in inventory as of December 31, 1919. The taxpayer on this date showed an inventory of approximately $75,000,000, of which $39,577,036.68 consisted of hides, mostly purchased in 1918 at war prices. The return for the taxable year 1919 was made on the basis of an inventory at cost. The taxpayer later filed claim for refund, alleging that since its returns were made on the basis of "cost" or "market" whichever is lower as to inventories, it was entitled to have the inventory of December 31, 1919, revised on the basis of market, for the reason that market was lower than cost.

The bureau's explanation of its action is shown in Exhibit 7. This division made an examination of this case in the files of the bureau. Its findings are shown in Exhibit 8 of this report.

CONCLUSION

The principle applied in revising the inventory is in accord with the commissioner's regulations. The prices adopted by the bureau were accepted without check. The case is illustrative of many refunds resulting from the revaluation of inventories at market value.

Case No. 13

Subject: Installment sales.

DISCUSSION

Considerable discussion has been had in connection with the so-called double-taxation feature of the present regulations applying to the installment sales method of reporting income in the year or years of transition from the accrual basis.

This actual case where the taxpayer originally reported on the accrual basis and subsequently changed to the installment basis shows that considerable benefit is secured by this change, even if the cash received in the current year on account of sales made in prior years is included in income. The latter basis was the method used in this case, the figures for which are shown below:

Year	Net income		Decrease in taxable income by change
	Accrual basis	Installment basis
1918	$263,340.11	$253,471.90	$9,868.21
1919	497,854.20	135,336.70	362,517.50
1920	272,706.67	151,211.10	121,495.57

The above adjustments in net income were by far the principal changes made in these returns and are therefore the controlling factor in the allowance of the refund of $96,497.47 plus interest of $34,606.65. This large refund is allowable even under the double taxation method; if the method outlined in the Treasury decision of October 20, 1920, had been used the refund would have been still larger.

CONCLUSION

This case appears properly determined. It is presented as illustrative of the effect of changing from the accrual to the installment basis.

MISCELLANEOUS REMARKS

The study of individual cases has been very valuable to this division as a means of determining in a practical and concrete manner the operation and effect of our revenue acts.

The search for the principal points at issue in these cases has indicated certain provisions of the act which are troublesome. It has become apparent that wherever valuations are necessary difficulty follows. The determinations of facts as of dates far in the past is also a source of trouble.

Numerous cases in addition to these described could be listed but it appeared that those chosen are sufficient for the general purposes of this report. The complete file on the 323 cases submitted is in the hands of this division and open to the inspection of the members of the joint committee.

CONCLUSION

While certain points in connection with the refunds have been frankly criticized in this report it must be admitted that the great majority of the refunds have been correctly determined on the basis of the facts submitted.

Even in the relatively few doubtful cases it is also conceded that there are ample grounds for a difference of opinion.

The examination of these refunds has been instructive in connection with the more constructive work of this division provided for in section 1203 of the revenue act of 1926.

Respectfully submitted.

L. H. PARKER,
Chief Division of Investigation.

DECEMBER 8, 1927.

BUREAU OF INTERNAL REVENUE,
OFFICE OF THE GENERAL COUNSEL,
March 12, 1927.

In re John Doe & Co. (Inc.).

MR. COMMISSIONER: A certificate of overassessment in favor of the above-named company for the period February 25 to June 30, 1920, has been submitted for approval in the amount of $116,260.83.

The taxpayer filed its original return for the fiscal year July 1, 1919, to June 30, 1920. This return indicated a taxable income of $346,408.44. From the information contained in the return and in briefs filed by the taxpayer the bureau has found that there was no attempt to incorporate prior to February 25, 1920, and that prior to this date there was no user of corporate powers and that the taxpayer did not exist as a de facto corporation prior to that date. The bureau has, therefore, held that the taxpayer should file a return from February 25 to June 30, 1920. Inasmuch as the income for the entire fiscal year was included on the return, the ruling as to effective date of corporate organization excludes the income earned prior to February 25. This amount of income is approximately $226,408. Mr. Doe has been taxed on this income individually.

The income shown by the return has been reduced by an adjustment to closing inventory in the amount of $111,926.34 by an increase in purchase of $9,183.28 and by the allowance of accrued State taxes of $15,649.88. As above stated, the taxpayer benefits in these reductions in income to the extent which the portion of the year in which it was in existence bears to the total fiscal year.

A field investigation has been made by the bureau and after a careful review of the records of the goods on hand June 30, 1920, and of the market price of the inventory items a valuation resulting in the reduced inventory figure has been determined. Reference was made by the field examiner to actual sales of goods immediately after the inventory date to substantiate the market value. It is noted that the market price of the inventory items actually fell below the figure used in the preparation of the inventory valuation approved by the unit. It is believed that the reduction in the inventory to the amount found by the unit to be the true market price at the date the inventory was taken is a proper adjustment under the provisions of article 1584 of Regulations 62, and it is, therefore, recommended that this action be approved.

The adjustment to purchases is a net adjustment on account of outstanding purchase contracts which the taxpayer claims to have been filled prior to the close of the taxable year so as to make it the owner of the goods. Due to the fall in market price, this results in a claimed loss for the taxable year 1920. The revenue agent has rejected the taxpayer's claim in so far as it relates to goods which were billed and/or delivered after June 30, 1920. It is believed that this action is proper in that there was no appropriation of goods to the contract by the seller and hence the taxpayer was not vested with title to the goods prior to the close of the taxable year. The agent has, however, allowed to be included in inventory goods actually invoiced and billed to the taxpayer prior to June 30. The goods in question were actually received by the taxpayer prior to June 30 and returned for further processing as they did not come up to contract specifications and were in specie returned to the taxpayer at a later date. The inclusion of these goods in inventory due to the decline in market results in a deduction in 1920 income of $9,483.28.

The books of the taxpayer were on an accrual basis, and a surplus reserve was set aside to take care of the State taxes applicable to the period ended June 30, 1920, which taxes accrued before the end of that period. It is believed that those taxes constituted an allowable deduction from income and that the amended income found by the bureau is correct.

In view of the foregoing it is believed that the audit resulting in the present certificate of overassessment is correct, and it is recommended that the overassessment be allowed.

In re Roe & Roe.

Mr. COMMISSIONER: A notice of interest allowance in the amount of $12,697.61 has been prepared in favor of the above-named taxpayer for the calendar year 1917.

A certificate of overassessment of the taxable year 1917 in the amount of $60,014.94 was allowed and entered on Schedule It–A–17461, under dated of December 2, 1925, and a check, voucher No. 3935, was mailed to the taxpayer under date of April 16, 1926, covering $29,960.23, the refund portion of the overassessment. Of the amount of tax represented by the overassessment, $1,577.87 was abated, $14,291.41 was credited to unpaid taxes of John Roe, while $14,185.43 was credited to unpaid taxes of James Roe. The taxpayer has agreed to these credits.

At the time of making these adjustments interest in the amount of $14,135.68 was computed from the dates of payment of the tax (a) on the amount refunded to the date of the schedule on which the overassessment was allowed, or (b) on the amount credited to the due date of the outstanding tax to which credit was applied, as prescribed by section 1116 of the revenue act of 1926, as follows:

Amount refunded	Amount credited	Interest allowed		Interest
		From—	To—
$29,960.23		Apr. 1, 1918	Dec. 3, 1925	$13,791.55
	$27,974.74	do	June 15, 1918	344.13

No interest was computed on the balance credited, $502.14, as the date of payment thereof was subsequent to due date of the tax to which credit was applied.

Subsequently, the taxpayer filed suit in the United States Court of Claims for additional interest on the amounts credited to James Roe and John Roe, alleging that the interest on the amounts credited should have been computed from the date of payment of the tax to the date of the allowance of the credit.

Under date of May 4, 1927, the Attorney General was informed that upon reconsideration of the case this office takes the view that, since the partnership was a taxable entity distinct from the partners, there was no statutory authority for crediting the overassessment due the partnership against the deficiencies due from the individual partners. The credit was made solely under the consent filed by the partnership and the partners. In substance, the crediting of this overassessment by consent or contract against the individual partner's liability was a refund to the partnership paid to the persons designated by the partnership to receive it. This crediting being in substance a refund, interest should be computed in accordance with the statutory provisions relating to interest on refunds, and, accordingly, interest on the entire amount of the overassessment should be computed in accordance with the provisions of the revenue act of 1926, relating to refunds, since the refund in this case was paid after the passage of that act.

The Attorney General was requested if after considering the matter he agreed with the view taken by this office that he notify claimant's counsel that upon filing with him in escrow of a motion to dismiss the case would be continued by consent, the administrative file would be returned to the Income Tax Unit with direction to reopen the claim and to allow interest on the amount credited, and that upon the allowance and payment of the interest the motion to dismiss the case would be filed.

Under date of June 22, 1927, the Attorney General informed this office that the attorneys for the plaintiff had filed with him in escrow a motion to dismiss when settlement should be made.

Accordingly, a recomputation of the interest payable has been made, resulting in allowing interest on $57,934.93 from April 1, 1918, the date of payment of the tax to December 3, 1925, the date of allowance of the refund or credit, and on $502.14 from June 21, 1920, the date of payment of the tax to December 3, 1925, the date of the allowance of the refund or credit, making the total interest due $26,833.29, and as interest in the amount of $14,135.68 had previously been paid there remains the difference, or $12,697.61 additional interest to be paid.

Accordingly, it is recommended that the above-mentioned payment of interest be allowed.

A. W. GREGG,
General Counsel Bureau of Internal Revenue.

Mr. COMMISSIONER: A certificate of overassessment for the year 1920 in favor of the above-named company in the amount of $62,423.24 has been submitted for approval.

The unit has made a field examination of the taxpayer's records and has found an amended taxable income and statutory invested capital which result in an additional tax liability of $37,992.52. This determination of income and capital has been acquiesced in by the taxpayer. A claim was filed, however, for assessment under the provisions of sections 327 and 328 of the revenue act of 1918, and the present certificate of overassessment reduces the tax liability on a statutory basis by $100,415.76 to result in the proposed overassessment of $62,423.24.

The taxpayer lists several grounds for special assessment, among them being low officer's salaries, appreciation in value of assets, built-up good will not reflected in statutory capital, and understatement of assets on its books due to the fact that large sums expended on additions, replacements, and other capital items were charged to expense in prior years. The first three grounds stated by the taxpayer do not constitute a basis for the allowance of special assessment. The unit has found, however, from a review of the taxpayer's records for later years that large expenditures were made for additions and capital items. These expenditures were not capitalized but were charged to expense, and therefore the book value of assets is understated and the statutory capital can not be satisfactorily determined. An abnormality results due to this condition under the provisions of section 327 (a) of the revenue act of 1918.

In the preparation of a data sheet the unit has reviewed all of the concerns similarly circumstanced with respect to gross income, net income, profits per unit of business transacted, and capital employed, and has selected concerns engaged in a like or similar trade or business as that conducted by the taxpayer. It is believed that the present data sheet used in the computation of tax liability resulting in the proposed certificate of overassessment is the best that can be prepared and lists concerns selected in accordance with the provisions of section 328 of the revenue act of 1918.

In view of the foregoing, it is believed that the computation of income and tax liability resulting in the present certificate of overassessment is in accordance with the provisions of the revenue act of 1918, and it is therefore recommended that the certificate of overassessment be approved.

Mr. COMMISSIONER: Certificates of overassessment of corporation income taxes have been prepared in favor of the above-named company for the years 1922 and 1923 in the amounts of $37,533.74 and $74,467.11, respectively.

The above overassessments propose to refund the entire amount of tax assessed against the above-named company for the years 1922 and 1923. The returns originally filed show taxable income for 1922 and 1923 of $300,269.91 and $595,736.85. These original returns indicated that deductions had been taken for depreciation in the amounts of $238,423.98 and $241,651.47 for the years 1922 and 1923, respectively.

In the bureau audit of the case for the years 1917 to 1921, inclusive, segregation was made of the taxpayer's assets in the various classes and depreciation was allowed on the segregated costs of assets on the basis of the estimated life of each type of asset. The depreciation claimed by the taxpayer in its original returns was arbitrary and not based on the actual loss sustained from that source during the years in question.

Amended returns were filed by the taxpayer for the years 1922 and 1923 following the bureau audit for prior years and claiming depreciation on the same basis as had been allowed for the years 1917 to 1921, inclusive. The depreciation claimed in the amended returns for 1922 and 1923, respectively, was $627,082.56 and $639,926.19. In view of the fact that the amended returns reflected the actual depreciation sustained by the taxpayer and the reduction of income by this increased depreciation resulted in no income subject to tax, the present action in refunding the entire amount assessed on the original returns appears to be proper.

In addition to the foregoing it is noted that the audit of the return for the year 1921 indicates a statutory net loss of $988,382.41. The field examination of the case indicates that losses were sustained also for the years 1922, 1924, 1925, and 1926, and that the income for the year 1923 is less than $10,000. In view of the provisions of section 204 of the revenue act of 1921, the application of the net loss against the income for the year 1923 results in a net loss for the taxpayer for all of the years, 1921 to 1926, inclusive.

In view of the foregoing, it is recommended that the overassessments indicated above be allowed.

In re The "C" Oil Co.

Mr. COMMISSIONER: There have been prepared two certificates of overassessment in favor of the above-named taxpayer, one for 1918 in the amount of $293,144.84 and the other for 1919 in the amount of $406,861.90, corporation income and profits taxes. This corporation was affiliated with two small subsidiaries.

For 1918 the taxpayer filed a return reflecting a net income of $5,981,229.63 and invested capital of $7,003,437.45, and upon the resulting tax computation an assessment was made of $1,880,542.40. In this return a deduction was claimed for depletion of $2,161,133.71. Subsequently, on September 22, 1921, an amended return was filed for 1918 claiming a depletion deduction of $5,515,464.07 on oil and $63,365.62 on coal production and a consolidated net income of $1,507,421.92.

For 1919 a return was filed reflecting a net loss of $25,731,567.42, so that no tax was then assessed. This return claimed a depletion deduction of $37,733,986.23, mostly on oil and gas produced, the balance on coal. An amended return, filed September 22, 1921, showed a net loss of $25,104,907.78, and in this return the taxpayer claimed an allowance of oil depletion of $37,214,875.18, and depletion of $42,012.59 on coal.

On September 22, 1921, the taxpayer also filed a refund claim asking return of $2,494,751.16, made up of $1,894,751.16 for 1918, and $600,000 for 1919. This claim was based upon the amended returns then filed, and a request for application of the 1919 net loss against the 1918 net income, under section 204 (b) of the revenue act of 1918. The Income Tax Unit thereafter made an audit of the returns for 1917, 1918, and 1919, set out in bureau letters to the taxpayer on December 4, 1922. This audit disclosed an overassessment of $119,842.15 for 1917, which was proposed to be credited against additional taxes proposed, for 1918 in the amount of $154,670.47, and for 1919 in the amount of $550,276.46. These two amounts were assessed in December, 1922, and the refund claim for 1918 and 1919 accordingly rejected. Of the 1918 depletion of $5,515,464.07 deducted for oil, the bureau disallowed $2,736,384.16, and also disallowed $26,355.64 depletion on coal. The consolidated net income was set up as $4,269,046.03, and special assessment, under section 328 of the revenue act of 1918, was allowed, with an average profits tax rate of 40.62 per cent. The bureau audit also disallowed $27,470,113.59 depletion claimed for 1919 on oil, and $17,474.31 on coal, and there resulted a consolidated net income of $2,404,387.10.

Early in April, 1923, the taxpayer filed suit in the Court of Claims, asking recovery of $2,614,593.31 (with interest), which included the amount of the refund claim for 1918 and 1919, and the credit of $119,842.15 for 1917. The suit was based primarily on claims for additional depletion allowances through revaluation of the producing properties and establishment of increased discovery values. Sundry objections were raised, also the adjustments made by the bureau to the 1919 invested capital as returned. Testimony was taken in said suit, and thereafter, at the suggestion of the taxpayer, proposal was made to settle the case through agreement on the depletion allowance. The bureau has agreed to allow additional depletion on (oil) discovery values, in the amount of $613,702.63, for 1918, and the revised net income is $3,655,343.40. The tax computation, upon this net income, using the special assessment rate of 40.6214 per cent for determining the profits tax, discloses a total tax liability for 1918 of $1,742,068.03, as shown upon the certificate of overassessment.

For 1919, the audit of December 4, 1922, reduced the invested capital returned, from $12,357,869.09 to $10,745,115.44, chiefly through revision of the adjustments for Federal taxes in prior years, dividends paid within the current year, discount on capital stock issued for sundry tangible assets, sustained depreciation and depletion reserves, and inadmissible assets. The bureau has agreed to allow additional depletion, on discovery values, of $1,288,558.52, resulting in a net income of $1,115,828.58. By computing the tax thereon, without changing the invested capital set up in the letter of December 4, 1922, for profits-tax purposes, the corrected tax for 1919 is shown as $143,414.56, as indicated in the certificate of overassessment.

The revised depletion allowances having been computed by engineers of the bureau, and accepted by the taxpayer as a compromise basis for dismissal of its suit for refund of 1918 and 1919 taxes, it is recommended that the overassessments be allowed. Attention is called to the fact that $100,000 of the overassessment of $293,144.84 for 1918 was refunded to the taxpayer out of a prior appropriation, on December 7, 1926, and payment for 1918 to this taxpayer under schedule No. 22840 will be reduced by that amount.

In re Estate of John Moe.

Mr. COMMISSIONER: The claims for refund filed on behalf of the above-named estate on account of estate taxes paid have been prepared for allowance in the sums of $10,777.73 and $133,155.56.

The first claim was predicated upon an additional deduction sought on account of executors' commissions in the sum of $53,888.67. These commissions were approved by the court and paid and, therefore, constitute a proper deduction in determining the value of the net estate.

The second claim was based upon an additional deduction sought on account of debts of decedent. This indebtedness represents the decendent's liability as a member of the firm of John Moe & Co. In determining the decedent's liability under the former review of the return, there was included in the assets of the partnership bonds of the "X" Motor Truck Co. at a value of $750,000. It has now been established that these bonds are worthless and accordingly the decedent's liability on account of the indebtedness of the firm is increased in the sum of $665,777.78, which constitutes a proper deduction.

After taking into consideration the proposed adjustments, the value of the net estate is found to be $5,187,927.50, the tax upon the transfer of which amounts to $679,085.50. The estate paid a tax of $823,018.79, resulting in a total excess payment of $143,933.29, of which amount $10,777.73 is subject to be refunded as a result of the adjustment allowed on the basis of the first claim, and $133,155.56 as the result of the adjustment allowed on the basis of the second claim.

In view of the foregoing, it is recommended that the proposed refunds be allowed.

In re "X" Leather Co.

MR. COMMISSIONER: A certificate of overassessment of corporation income and profits taxes has been prepared in favor of the above-named company for the year 1919 in the amount of $346,813.36.

The overassessment is principally due to the allowance of a deduction in income through a revaluation of the inventory of raw hides owned by the taxpayer on December 31, 1919. Other adjustments to income have been made increasing the income shown on the return by approximately $2,000,000, which increase in income has been offset by the allowance of the reduction in closing inventory.

The income shown by the original consolidated return has been increased in the present audit of the case in the amount of $1,976,651.06. This increase in income is due to the disallowance of deductions taken on the original return for donations in the amount of $1,230, Federal income and profits taxes in the amount of $2,465.45, depletion in the amount of $145,891.70, depreciation of $4,492.02, losses in connection with bark and timber $14,641.72, losses on the sale of capital assets in the amount of $1,203,746.93, loss on railroad property in the amount of $6,558.37, and minor adjustments of $2,642.56. In addition the Income Tax Unit has restored to taxable income, Liberty bond interest of $425 and increase in surplus reserves of $594,557.31.

The disallowance of excessive deductions claimed for depletion and depreciation is in accordance with the determination by the Income Tax Unit of the proper depreciation and depletion sustained by the taxpayer during the year 1919. The allowance made in the present audit of the case is based upon a field examination and represents the actual depreciation and depletion sustained. The net increase in the surplus reserves was caused by charges to book profit and loss and the restoration of these erroneous charges to taxable income appears proper. The loss on the sale of capital assets arises in connection with deductions claimed by the "X" Leather Co. of $176,444.28, the "Y" River Land Co., $20,283.58; "R" and "S" Railroad Co., $2,450; "P" Tannig Co., $515,814.58; and "T" Tanning Co., $488,774.29.

In this connection the Income Tax Unit has found that the assets disposed of consisted of plants abandoned before March 1, 1913, and that the plants had a sales price in between the cost and their March 1, 1913, value. The taxpayer has acquiesced in the restoration to income of the amounts erroneously charged off as losses in connection with the sales of these plants. The loss claimed on the railroad property is in connection with property which was neither abandoned nor charged off during the year 1919. This claimed loss on the railroad property has accordingly been disallowed as a deduction from gross income by the Income Tax Unit. The foregoing additions to income appear proper, and as above stated, the taxpayer has acquiesced in the same.

The income shown on the return as increased by approximately $2,000,000 above explained, has been reduced by the revaluation of the closing inventory in the amount of $3,969,210.54 and the overassessment arises out of this change in inventory value. The Income Tax Unit has fixed prices on the various grades of raw hides owned by the taxpayer after a review of prevailing prices as indicated in trade papers of December 31, 1919. The prices fixed by the unit represent the actual market on December 31, 1919, and appear to have been determined in view of substantial market movements. The result of the revaluation of inventories is indicated in the following schedule:

Recapitulation of revised inventory

	Per books	As claimed	As allowed
Leather in stores	$17,117,048.59	$14,280,413.22	$14,117,048.59
Lumber	1,171,352.36	853,605.76	1,171,352.36
Glue	434,799.00	369,667.94	434,799.00
Hides	39,577,036.68	34,956,875.25	35,607,826.14
Betterments, etc	16,637,587.34	16,637,587.34	16,637,587.34
Total	74,937,823.97	67,098,148.51	70,968,613.43
Revised	70,968,613.43
Reduction	3,969,210.54

The invested capital shown on the original return has been reduced by $11,836,116.61. The reduction in capital is principally due to the exclusion of good will, the cash value of which at acquisition could not be satisfactorily established by the taxpayer. The reduction in invested capital increases the tax liability and reduces the present overassessment. The limitations of the good will included in invested capital to its cash value at acquisition is in accordance with the provisions of section 326 (a) (4) and (5) of the revenue act of 1918.

In view of the foregoing, it is recommended that the overassessment above indicated be allowed.

General Counsel Bureau of Internal Revenue.

In re "X" Leather Co.

MY DEAR MR. PARKER: Pursuant to your written instructions, I have made an examination of the above-named taxpayer's case, in which a refund of $346,813.36 is proposed for the year 1919.

The principal item constituting adjustments resulting in the refund is the repricing of an inventory item at the end of the taxable year, classified in schedules as hides. The pricing of the hides has been made upon the basis of the market value at the date of the inventory, whereas the taxpayer's original return showed the hides at cost. Data sufficient to verify the correctness of these pricings is not available, and an examination of the schedule would seem to indicate that the prices have been carefully worked out.

It is, therefore, recommended that no objection to the proposed refund be made.

Respectfully,

G. D. CHESTEEN,

COMMUNICATIONS TO THE TREASURY DEPARTMENT BY L. H. PARKER

JULY 12, 1928.

Mr. E. C. ALVORD,
Special Assistant to the Secretary of the Treasury,
Walker-Johnson Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. ALVORD: In connection with the overassessments totaling $1,231,006.78 proposed in the case of P. Lorillard & Co., of New York, and submitted to this committee on June 21, 1928, the following comments are made:

This division has substantially the same opinion in regard to this allowance as in the case of the R. J. Reynolds Tobacco Co. (Our letter dated August 9, 1927.) However, as the bureau, after review, did not sustain our opinion in the Reynolds case to request another review on the same points in this case would appear to occasion unnecessary work, and therefore such a request is not made.

On June 4, 1928, the Supreme Court of the United States held in the Williamsport Wire Rope Co. case that the courts were without jurisdiction to review the determination of the commissioner in special assessment cases. In view of the fact that during our investigation of the R. J. Reynolds case we were informed that the case was allowed because it was feared that the taxpayer would get a larger refund by going to the courts, and using the American Tobacco Co. as a comparative, it would seem proper to request your consideration of the question as to changing the policy of the bureau in such cases as this, where no "exceptional hardship" is proven, and where the taxpayer is not entitled to relief except through executive action.

It is not desired to bring about any loss of interest to the Government in this case, but, as the date of payment is not until July 21, it is believed sufficient consideration can be given to our second comment in the nine days available.

Very truly yours,

———— ————.

JULY 12, 1928.

Mr. E. C. ALVORD,
Special Assistant to the Secretary of the Treasury,
Walker-Johnson Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. ALVORD: Please find inclosed copy of a report from Mr. G. D. Chesteen, corporation auditor for this committee in regard to the overassessment proposed in the case of Eisemann Bros., Boston, Mass. This case was submitted to the committee on June 25, 1928, and the 30-day period will expire on July 25.

The overassessment in this case is due entirely to the allowance of special assessment under section 210 of the revenue act of 1917. The ground for the allowance is excessive borrowed capital.

It is the opinion of Mr. Chesteen, concurred in by the writer, that excessive borrowed capital does not constitute a ground for special assessment in the year 1917, and that this opinion is sustained by the Board of Tax Appeals Decisions and the position taken by the appeals division of the general counsel's office.

It is requested that due consideration be given to the points raised in Mr. Chesteen's report before the refund or credit occasioned by this overassessment is finally made. As 13 days remain before the 30-day period expires, and as there is practically only one issue involved, it appears certain that ample time is available for such consideration without causing loss of interest to the Government.

Very truly yours,

JULY 13, 1928.

Mr. E. C. ALVORD,
Special Assistant to the Secretary of the Treasury,
Walker-Johnson Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. ALVORD: Application of the special-assessment provisions, section 210 of the revenue act of 1917 and sections 327 and 328 of the revenue acts of 1918 and 1921, by the Bureau of Internal Revenue are still giving this office much concern.

Your consideration is requested of the following propositions which appear to be correct from our investigation:

1. During the year March 1, 1927, to March 1, 1928, out of the total refunds and credits allowed by the bureau and submitted to the joint committee under the urgent deficiency bill, it was found that 21 per cent in amount of money were due to the allowance of special assessment.

2. It appears, therefore, that the total refunds and credits on account of special assessment were very probably in the neighborhood of $50,000,000 for the year above noted if the same relation existed in the smaller refunds as in those over $75,000.

3. The Supreme Court of the United States decided on June 4, 1928, in the case of the Williamsport Wire Rope Co. against the United States, that the courts have no jurisdiction to review the determinations of special assessment made by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue. It results that while deficiencies may be reviewed by the Board of Tax Appeals, the determination of the commissioner in regard to special assessment where refunds or credits are involved, is final.

4. It now appears that the commissioner had it entirely within his discretion during the period above noted whether to give back this

$50,000,000 to the taxpayers or not, a power which is unique in our executives branch, as the return of such money could not be enforced by law.

5. Under the revenue act of 1928, refunds and credits in excess of $75,000 are still submitted to the joint committee. These refunds, under the act above mentioned, were first submitted on June 9, 1928. On July 11, out of a total number of 45 cases submitted under the above act 11 cases, or 24 per cent, were due principally to the allowance of special assessment.

6. The different divisions of the general counsel's office are not in accord on the basis for the allowance of special assessment. The appeals and civil divisions hold, for instance, that borrowed capital does not constitute an abnormality under the revenue act of 1917. On the other hand, the interpretative and claims divisions hold that borrowed capital does constitute an abnormality. (See report on Elsemann case already submitted.) From the above, it results that the bureau is more liberal in allowing refunds and credits than it is in assessing additional tax. This state of affairs appears indefensible.

It is the opinion of the writer that in view of the fact that the special-assessment provisions have not been in the revenue acts since 1921 and also because there appears to be no diminution in the amount of refunds and credits allowed under these provisions, that the application of same be given serious consideration in order to restrict the granting of refunds and credits to the really meritorious cases.

This division can not help but note that while the law requires that an "exceptional hardship" must be proven in each case, the bureau rarely, if ever, meets this requirement and contents itself merely with proving an abnormality. It appears far from the purpose of Congress to give relief to corporations with large surpluses who are, and were, well able to pay the statutory tax, to say nothing of the fact that in these refund and credit cases the tax was, of course, actually paid.

The writer would also like to examine the record of special-assessment cases kept by the commissioner in accordance with section 328 (c) of the revenue acts of 1918 and 1921, and awaits your advice as to where such record may be examined.

It appears to the writer that the general subject of special assessment is of such importance that the policy of the bureau on these determinations should be the subject of conference, especially in view of the Williamsport Wire Rope Co. case above noted. I would be glad to be informed as to your views on this subject.

Very truly yours,

———.

Mr. E. C. ALVORD,
Special Assistant to the Secretary of the Treasury,
Walker-Johnson Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. ALVORD: Inclosed please find a copy of a report addressed to me from the corporation auditor of this committee in reference to the refund proposed on schedule No. 28611 to the Montana Power Co., of Butte, Mont.

It appears from this report that there may exist an error in the computation of invested capital due to the failure to take into account all the assets and liabilities of a subsidiary company upon its acquisition. The apparent omission of some $19,000,000 in bonds outstanding seems particularly important.

It is requested that the case be reviewed on the points raised in this memorandum and that the writer be advised of the results of your review. Date of payment in this case is April 30, 1928.

Very truly yours,

L. H. PARKER.

———

MARCH 26, 1928.

Mr. L. H. PARKER,
Chief Division of Investigation,
Joint Committee on Internal Revenue Taxation,
House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

In re Montana Power Co., 40 East Broadway, Butte, Mont.

MY DEAR MR. PARKER: Pursuant to your written instructions, I have made an examination of the proposed refund to the above-named taxpayer in the amounts and for the years as set forth below:

Year	Amount
1920
1921	$35,660.71
1922	39,325.29
	62,441.94

The proposed refund for the year 1920 appears to be in error. The basis for this conclusion is set forth below:

FINDING OF FACTS

The commissioner has determined a net income for the year 1920 in the amount of $2,928,172.17. The excess-profits tax is not computed in the final A–2 letter. A previous A–2 letter, however, dated January 18, 1927, disclosed an invested capital of $40,927,903.94, and upon the basis of this computation the commissioner in the final A–2 letter to the taxpayer stated that the credit under the provisions of section 312 was in excess of the net income and for that reason no excess-profits tax was due for the calendar year 1920. The computation of invested capital as thus disclosed appears to be in error. The facts and reasons for this position are as follows:

OPINION

The Montana Power Co. was organized in December, 1912, with an authorized capital stock of $25,000,000 preferred and $75,000,000 common. The company was organized for the purpose of effecting a merger of a number of small public utilities operating in Montana and adjoining States. At the time of incorporation, capital stock was issued for the following companies and their subsidiaries: Butte Electric & Power Co., Madison River Power Co., Missouri River Electric & Power Co., and Billings & Eastern Montana Power Co. These companies, with their subsidiaries, were merged with the Montana Power Co. as a result of their acquisition. The record does not show whether the stock of the Montana Power Co. was issued to the companies direct, or whether it was issued to the stockholders of these companies, after which the companies were liquidated. In either case, the treatment for income-tax purposes is the same, and the manner in which the merger was effected is not material.

Among the assets of the Butte Electric & Power Co. was one-half the capital stock outstanding of the Great Falls Water Power & Townsite Co. The taxpayer, in the instant case, desiring to own the entire capital stock of this company, in the following year—that is, the calendar year 1913—issued $17,500,000 common and $5,000,000 preferred stock to John D. Ryan, the then owner of the remaining one-half capital stock of the foregoing company. An additional $5,000,000 capital stock was then issued for the entire capital stock of the Thompson Falls Power Co., the capital stock of the latter company being $5,000,000.

Subsequent to the acquisition of the Great Falls Water Power & Townsite Co., which was a holding company, the capital stock of the latter was reduced by partial liquidation, in which the stock of its subsidiaries—the Great Falls Power Co. and the Great Falls Townsite Co.—were distributed to the parent company. The organization thus effected continued through the taxable years 1917 to 1923. It is apparent therefore that the Montana Power Co. issued its stock partly as a result of the merger of certain companies and partly for the acquisition of certain subsidiary companies. For the purpose of invested capital for the years 1917 to 1921, the bureau has consistently held that where stock of a subsidiary is acquired by stock of the parent company the amount to be included in consolidated invested capital with respect to the company acquired is computed in the same manner as if the assets had been acquired instead of the stock. This position has been upheld by the Board of Tax Appeals (see Hollingsworth, Turner & Co., Vol. I, United States Board of Tax Appeals Repts., p. 958).

The bureau apparently attempted to apply the principle set forth above in the computation of invested capital in this case, but, due to an error in excluding the excess value reported on the return, appears to have allowed an excess amount in invested capital for the year 1920 to the extent of approximately $16,401,077.74. It is obvious, from the statements set forth above as to the manner of issue of capital stock for assets, that liabilities of all properties merged, as well as affiliated, at the time of issue of capital stock, must be taken into consideration in determining the net amount of capital stock issued for properties. The taxpayer appears to have set up on its books at the time of incorporation the entire par value of capital stock issued therefor. An appraisal was made of all physical properties, and a write up in excess of these properties as carried on the predecessor company's books was made to the extent of the amount necessary in order to make a total of assets equal to the total capital stock and liabilities of the companies merged.

The above additional depreciation has been allowed in the closing of the years 1918 and 1919 in excess of the amount allowed in A–2 letters for those years prior to the date of the issue of the A–2 letter for 1920, as shown above.

(c) Amortization allowed for 1918:

Name of company: Montana Power Co.; year, 1918; amortization allowed, $238,970.20.

The above represents the amount recommended in an engineer's report dated January 9, 1928, which appears not to have been given effect to at the time of the preparation of this memorandum.

On the basis of the invested capital set forth above the approximate additional tax due for the year 1920 is $259,380.42, as shown by the following computation:

Excess-profits credit

8 per cent of invested capital		$1,840,777.05
Special exemption		3,000.00
Excess-profits credit		1,843,777.05

Computation of excess-profits tax

Invested capital	per cent	20
Income		$3,284,779.33
Credit		$1,843,777.05
Balance		$1,441,002.28
Rate	per cent	20
Tax		$288,200.46

Income tax

Net income		$3,284,779.33
Less:
Interest on obligations of United States not exempt	$104.51
Excess-profits tax	288,200.46
Exemption	2,000.00
		290,304.97
Balance taxable at 10 per cent		2,994,474.36	299,447.44
Total income and excess-profits tax			587,647.90
Tax previously assessed			328,267.48
Additional tax due for 1920			259,380.42

Inasmuch as the commissioner has proposed a refund of $35,660.71, whereas there appears to be an additional tax due of approximately $260,000, it would appear that the apparent error should be called to the attention of the bureau in order that the determination might be made of whether or not a refund should be proposed in this case.

VALUATION OF PROPERTIES

The result of book entries at the date of incorporation and acquisition of the properties was to record in the account of properties, an excess value sufficient to set up the par value of the capital stock of the companies. The taxpayer, in the year 1913, appears to have made an appraisal of the properties for the purpose of rates, and, in accordance with this determination, made claim to its original book entries for valuation of properties. An engineer of the amortization section of the Internal Revenue Bureau, J. W. Swaren, was assigned to this case, and, after an exhaustive examination, set up a valuation of physical properties at the date of acquisition of the companies, in the following amounts:

Subsidiary	Value of—			Total
	Physical assets	Water rights	Intangibles
Butte Electric & Power Co.	$3,000,348.57	$0.00	$379,029.40	$3,379,377.97
Madison River Power Co.	4,508,209.76	0.00	0.00	4,508,209.76
Billings & Eastern Montana Power Co.	1,549,008.08	9,760.40	987,917.90	2,546,686.38
Missouri River Electric & Power Co.	7,699,029.02	0.00	0.00	7,699,029.02
Thompson Falls Power Co.	145,833.43	2,234,188.28	0.00	2,380,021.71
Great Falls Power Co.	8,016,407.29	7,150,042.00	0.00	15,166,449.29
Rainbow Hotel (two-thirds interest)	185,925.33	0.00	0.00	185,925.33
National Realty Co. (one-half interest)	22,593.75	0.00	0.00	22,593.75
Total	25,127,355.23	9,393,990.68	1,366,947.30	35,888,293.21

It is therefore recommended that for the purposes of computing the invested capital of the taxpayer, that the sum of $35,888,293.21 be established as the values of properties acquired by stock issue at the time of merger.

In addition to the above properties, the taxpayer made claim for other properties acquired by stock issue, as follows:

Subsidiary	Date of acquisition	Value of assets acquired
		Physical	Water power	Intangibles	Total
Conrad Electric and Power Co.	Oct. 1, 1913	$21,757.87	$0.00	$0.00	$21,757.87
Mesa Power Co.	Aug. 5, 1914	55,222.93	0.00	0.00	55,222.93

All costs and audit features of this appraisal are subject to check by the auditor or revenue agent assigned to the field investigation of this case.

Protest to this valuation appears not to have been made. The record indicates that the taxpayer accepted immediately the valuation proposed by the bureau. This valuation, it will be noted, has been used in the computation of the corrected invested capital. The engineer, in making the computation of the value of water rights, utilized the records and results of the taxpayer for the period 1913 to the date of the examination, 1923. He also made approximations and speculations as to what the possibilities as to earning power and increase in the plant and development of water rights would be up to 1942. The utilization of subsequent results of a taxpayer and the approximation of a long period of future years as to growth of population, increase in industrial plants, and amount of electricity to be used, to establish the value of water rights at a given date, in order to prove the actual cash value of stock issued therefor for invested capital, appears open to question in the light of the provisions of section 326 of the revenue act of 1918. It is not believed, however, in view of the amount established for water rights, that even though the principles adopted may be open to question, the results should be criticized. Comparison of the market value of the capital stock of the company immediately after incorporation while probably influenced by future possibilities, yet is some indication of the value of properties acquired. According to stock quotations, the stock of the company on March 1, 1913, had a value of approximately $45 per share. Careful study of the whole file in the case with respect to the valuation of the property, convinces the reviewer that the value recommended by the engineer is reasonable and is not open to question.

COMMENTS AS TO PRIOR YEARS

The apparent overstatement of invested capital as shown for the year 1920 was also made in the years 1918 and 1919. In those years the taxpayer was determined not to be subject to excess-profits tax, and a refund was granted in each year, the amount being approximately $80,000 for both years. A tentative approximation of the apparent error for the year 1918 would indicate an additional tax was due of approximately $750,000. The taxpayer, in the year 1918, reported an income of approximately $3,200,000. This gives an approximate tax of 25 per cent.

The question of whether or not the taxpayer might be entitled under those circumstances to special assessment, of course, can not be approximated. It is possible that if a tax of this amount had been proposed the taxpayer would have been entitled to some reduction of the $750,000, on the basis that the tax should have been determined in comparison with representative corporations doing similar business, as provided in sections 327 and 328 of the revenue act of 1918. The years 1918 and 1919 appear to have been outlawed so far as the right of the Government to impose an additional tax is concerned. There is, however, apparently a claim pending for further refund for the year 1918, based upon the fact that the bureau has proposed to allow amortization in the amount of approximately $238,000. It is obvious that the taxpayer would be entitled to at least $25,000 further refund for the year 1918, unless the correction for invested capital mentioned is made.

For the year 1919 it has not been deemed necessary to set up a computation for invested capital. An approximation of the invested capital would indicate that a small amount of excess-profits tax would have been due for that year, but inasmuch as the statute has run as to additional assessment and no claims for further refund are pending it has not been necessary to make the computation.

For the year 1921 the reviewer has not made a computation of invested capital. It is assumed that the bureau in reviewing the question raised as to 1920 will make proper correction of any adjustment found necessary with respect to 1921 if it is found that an excess-profits tax is due for that year.

Respectfully,

G. D. CHESTEEN,
Corporation Auditor.

FEBRUARY 9, 1928.

Mr. E. C. ALVORD,
Special Assistant to the Secretary of the Treasury,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. ALVORD: In regard to the proposed refund in the case of the Diamond Coal & Coke Co., Pittsburgh, Pa., it appears that there may be an error in the computation of this refund, due to the allowance of both amortization and depreciation on the same property in the same year. I inclose herewith a copy of a report addressed to me from Mr. Chesteen, corporation auditor of this committee, which outlines his opinion in regard to the apparent error above noted.

This refund is contained on schedule No. 28092, the date of payment being March 19, 1928.

Please advise me as to the opinion of the general counsel on the question raised.

Very truly yours,

L. H. PARKER.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD].

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Chairman, and gentlemen of the committee——

Mr. WINGO. Before the gentleman proceeds I would like to ask a question, because there is some confusion about it. Does this action in the court involving $100,000,000 principal and $60,000,000 interest cover the 1917 year only, or does it include all previous years?

Mr. WOOD. My information is that it covers everything involved in the 1917 returns.

Mr. WINGO. And the subsequent years might be more?

Mr. WOOD. Yes; I understand there are the return years 1918, 1919, and 1920 yet to settle.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. You know all 12 cases cover a billion dollars.

Mr. WINGO. What I wanted to know was whether it covered only the 1917 claim?

Mr. WOOD. I think that is all. I find that the suit in the Court of Claims by the United States Steel Corporation for $161,000,000, composed of $101,000,000 tax and $60,000,000 interest, is for the taxes of the return year 1917. With the payment of the claim for $26,000,000 this suit will be closed forever and that will be the end of it so far as 1917 is concerned. A suit is also pending in the Court of Claims for approximately $50,000,000 and interest for the return year 1918.

Mr. WINGO. There has been some confusion about it.

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Chairman, I listened attentively to the speech made by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] the other day. I listened with equal patience to a rehearsal of the same speech before the Committee on Appropriations, of which I am a member, and I heard the most of it again for a third time to-day.

And through all this trial and tribulation I have been trying to make up my mind what it is that has prompted the gentleman from Texas to oppose this particular appropriation.

Since the beginning of the fiscal year 1917 and down to October 1, 1928, we have refunded in round numbers $975,000,000. It seems a little peculiar that not until this particular moment has any question been raised by the gentleman from Texas about the tax refund procedure. It might have occurred, and perhaps has occurred, to some of you gentlemen while listening to him, that when the American Tobacco tax refund was up the same question was not raised about that by the gentleman from Texas. The refund to the Steel Corporation is only one of a number of cases that have had similar treatment at the hands of the Bureau of Internal Revenue.

Why was not some question raised as to some of these other cases? Can it be that disappointment has embittered the soul of the man from Texas? Can it be that because he was not successful in defeating the Greek loan that he has taken this means of getting even with the Treasury Department of the United States?

What is involved in this question? There is no more involved in this question than has been involved in all of these cases that have been coming before this Joint Committee on Internal Revenue Taxation and will continue to come before it if it continues to have the duty of receiving them. The same methods have been employed, Assistant Secretary Bond testifies, except that they have been more particular with reference to the Steel case than with most any other case, because of the amount involved, and because of the fact that it is one of the very largest corporations in the United States, and because it has been charged here that the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States is a stockholder in that concern.

The gentleman from Texas would have the country believe that the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Mellon, has been sitting on one side of the table dictating what these settlements should be with the interests with which he may be connected. The gentleman from Texas certainly should not try to deceive the American people into a belief of that character, when he knows that the Secretary of the Treasury has nothing to do with making these settlements, when he knows that that responsibility by law is upon the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, who is appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate of the United States and is independent of the Secretary of the Treasury. We took pains when Mr. Bond, the Assistant Secretary, was before the committee, to inquire with reference to the procedure in this case as compared with other cases, anticipating that the very insinuations would be made that have been made to-day by the gentleman from Texas, as to whether the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Mellon, in any case, has ever either suggested an addition to or a subtraction from, and he said that in no case has Mr. Mellon ever intervened personally, either directly or indirectly, in the settlement.

Mr. Mellon needs no encomiums from me. Speak about his destroying the confidence of the people, should he perchance be the Secretary of the Treasury for four years more! Mr. Chairman, in behalf of the American people, I say that I hope he will be the Secretary of the Treasury for four years more. [Applause on the Republican side.] I am proud of the record that he has made. Every Republican is proud of the record that he has made. Every fair-minded Democrat is proud of the record that he has made, because he is proud of his country and of what Mr. Mellon has contributed to its success. Not since the beginning of this Government has he had a peer in that office.

Three times since he has become Secretary of the Treasury he has refunded a national loan at a lesser rate of interest than that at which it was originally put out. Never in the history of the Democratic Party was such a feat performed. In doing that Mr. Mellon has saved to the American people $75,000,000 annually in interest. The Secretary of the Treasury needs no support from me. The record that he has made is the record of the progress of this country during the period of his service, and the people of the United States can never repay the obligation that they owe to him—this man who has been reviled by some of you, who has been insinuated against. You can not point a finger to a single scintilla of evidence showing any disregard on his part in the performance of the high duty imposed upon him from the time he became Secretary of the Treasury down to this actual hour.

What is the question before the House? The gentleman from Texas (Mr. GARNER) and his party colleagues are asking you to vote against this item of $75,000,000 for refund of taxes erroneously or illegally collected. Suppose you do; what will be the result? Nothing can occur such as the gentleman from Texas would have you believe would occur by way of investigation. If any investigation were had by such a committee as he suggested the Speaker appoint, it would have nothing to do with the settlement with the Steel Corporation. That, as has already been stated, has been made. What then would be the result? If this $75,000,000 is denied, there are thousands of people throughout the United States, large and small, who are just as much entitled to their refund as the Steel Corporation is and who would be deprived of receiving it at this time. Are you going to take the responsibility of saying to them: "You shall wait until the next session of Congress for that money that you have been waiting for since 1917? Do not you believe that you would be taking a responsibility that should not be thrust upon you, and are you willing to do it? Are you willing to say to the people of the United States that, forsooth, because you have some grudge against the Treasury Department and want to get even with it you will take this $75,000,000 appropriation out of the bill and make all the claimants wait a year or more for the money that they are entitled to between now and July 1, 1929? That is the practical result.

Those who have spoken here in opposition to this item have taken pains to say that they know of no fraud, that they know of no collusion, that they know of no illegal act involved in it. Why, then, again I ask, should this case be made an exception to those thousands of other cases? They are settling these cases at the rate of 14,400 a month. They are within three years of being current. If they are permitted to go on and settle them in this businesslike way in which we are settling them, we will be current and we will have arrived at the stage that Mr. GARNER has been trying to have us arrive at for lo these many years. But he would stop this machinery. For what purpose? No accomplishment can be had unless we change the organic law. We began in 1918 in this same manner in making these consolidated return settlements under a regulation and continued under the regulation until 1921 when this same process and policy were enacted into law, and the gentleman from Texas voted for it. So that in condemning the process that has been followed in this case, in all these cases of many millions of dollars, he is condemning the program laid down by himself, and supported by the Congress. If there should be any criticism, then the criticism should be of Congress, which fixed this process. Mr. McAdoo should be criticized, if it is wrong, for inaugurating it by Treasury regulation in 1918.

Let me say in passing, that the case to which Mr. GARNER referred here, where there was a refund of 33 per cent, 11 years ago, was not under this administration. That was under a Democratic administration, but we hear no criticism with reference to the administration that permitted that thing to be.

If this were any other claimant than the Steel Corporation, if the amount involved were $500 instead of $26,000,000, there would be no question made here to-day, unless some fraud, some collusion, or some unlawful act were pointed out. Why I ask—and I ask the gentleman from Texas to answer—should we make an exception of this case? We have been intrusting, and we must continue to trust, the matter of making these settlements to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, because of our faith in his integrity and in the integrity of his employees.

Why, if it was not for the confidence that this Congress has in the executive officers of the Government, this Government would go to pot in no time. This Government is founded upon confidence; and I want to say to you that it has been very seldom that there has been any abuse of confidence on the part of officials high in authority in the Government of the United States. I think we can with more than justifiable pride point to the fact that no one has ever occupied the position of Secretary of the Treasury of the United States who has ever incurred the disfavor of the American people by reason of any defalcation or any malfeasance in his office.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. WOOD. Certainly.

Mr. CRAMTON. I think about 170,000 of these cases are handled by the department annually. What does the gentleman think of the comparative efficiency with which either the Committee on Appropriations of this House or the House itself could investigate the merits of these claims that are passed upon, and what about the possibilities of politics entering into the decisions regarding them if this House is to be the final arbiter?

Mr. WOOD. It would be made the football of politics, and you would find men upon that side trying to make political capital out of it, if perchance they were in power, and we would also find gentlemen on this side—human nature is so weak—who could not resist the temptation to take advantage of the opportunity afforded.

Now what does an investigation by this Congress of the steel cases involve? It involves 195 subsidiaries, extending over a period of 10 years or 11 years. Mr. Bond, in testifying before us, said it would take a string of trucks to haul up the papers involved in the audit of this case; that it would make a pile 10 feet high covering an entire room the size of one of the rooms of the Committee on Appropriations. Do you think that any committee appointed by this body could become as conversant with this complicated subject in a single session of Congress as have these trained men who have been put upon this special work and kept at it continuously, and doing nothing else for years? How much reliance would this House have in the action of any such committee—no matter how much confidence it might have in them—when so much is involved in these examinations, covering this period of years, with this multiplicity of interests, involving, if you please, these truck loads of documents? No. It would be physically impossible and mentally impossible.

So, after all, I say we must have confidence in those in the executive branch who are instructed to do that thing, in those who are charged under the law with that duty. If gentlemen who are criticizing now could point their finger to any dereliction of any kind or any conspiracy whereby the Government of the United States is going to lose a farthing, then there would be something in the contention that is made.

Now, then, let us look for a moment at what occurred when they sent this case up to the Joint Tax Committee. That committee is composed of five men from the Senate and five men from the House. They had a quorum present. You have heard who were there: Mr. GARNER and Mr. COLLIER, representing the minority side, and Mr. SMOOT and Mr. REED and Mr. HAWLEY, representing the majority side. Five hours were spent in the conference. After the conference had closed Mr. HAWLEY said to Mr. GARNER, "Will you make a motion to disapprove this settlement?" Then was the time for Mr. GARNER to act, or else forever hold his peace.

But taking the promise of the Treasury Department that if there was a vote of disapproval of the settlement made they would not pay it but would go into court and let it drag its weary way for 10 years with 6 per cent additional interest each year. Mr. GARNER of Texas did not make the motion. Why? It was too enormous a thing. He would not take the responsibility involved in that action. That was the consideration that moved Mr. Parker, the committee expert. He, too, did not want to take the responsibility. Mr. REED had represented the Steel Co. previously in some legal capacity. He would not make a motion on that account.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. WOOD. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Is the Steel Co. case the only refund about which there is any question?

Mr. WOOD. There has been no question raised about the Steel Co. case. There may have been a question raised, however, by Mr. Parker, the expert, who was afraid to touch it because it was too big. Many other cases have been certified up to this committee, and no question has been raised about the amount. You can take the letters referred to by Mr. GARNER of Texas and examine them, and in no case has the gentleman found any fault with the amount agreed upon or found to be due by the Treasury Department. The only fault he has found has been in the method of computation and in the mode of procedure that has been followed in this case, like those in other cases. The method followed in those other cases is exactly the same procedure that was followed in the Steel case.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD. Yes.

Mr. CRISP. I am aware that my colleague from Texas [Mr. GARNER] has expressed his opinion in the committee, but if this committee performs no function and is only a receptacle to which these returns are sent, I would like to have the gentleman's view as to the advisability of the discontinuance of this committee.

Mr. WOOD. I was opposed to placing this refund duty on the joint committee at the time it was done. I could not see how it could serve any purpose. As was stated by the gentleman from Texas, it was first placed upon an appropriation bill, a deficiency bill, as I remember. It was the result of a compromise with the Senate in an attempt made by some gentlemen at the other end of this Capitol to get some legislation with reference to publicity of tax matters. This Congress has gone on record as being opposed to this idea of publicity of tax returns, and they were seeking, through a rider upon an appropriation bill, the accomplishment of the very thing that had been denied by the Congress.

Mr. TREADWAY. Will the gentleman yield for an interruption?

Mr. WOOD. Yes.

Mr. TREADWAY. Is the gentleman referring to the manner in which the joint committee was originally created or to the fact of reporting refunds in excess of $75,000?

Mr. WOOD. I am referring to the manner in which this refund reporting scheme was originally established. My memory is that it was first established by a rider upon a deficiency appropriation bill and later put into permanent law in the 1928 revenue act. I am not referring to the original purpose for which the Joint Tax Committee was created by the 1926 revenue act.

We have found that in all these millions of dollars worth of refunds there has been no objection to the settlement but the objection has been to the method of arriving at the settlement; yet that method is the method that has been prescribed by law, following out the regulations adopted by Secretary McAdoo away back at the beginning of things in 1918.

Now, I think it is an encomium and a compliment to the Bureau of Internal Revenue and the Treasury Department that they have so conducted their audits and that they have so justly arrived at conclusions as to what is fair to the Government and fair to the taxpayers, that all of these claims, in excess of $75,000, have passed the scrutiny of the expert, and Mr. GARNER says he is an expert, well calculated to go into these things and find out what is right and what is wrong. I think it is a compliment to the department that in only one single instance out of nearly 700 such cases has there ever been found a flaw with reference to the amount of money that has been allowed by the department in connection with these refunds.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD. I yield.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Under existing law have we any control over the payment of the refunds?

Mr. WOOD. The courts have no control over them in some cases. They have been talking here and much stress has been laid upon the fact that these refunds ought to be denied so as to force somebody to go into court and have the question determined before we pay the money. However, before we do that, gentlemen, we have something which we must do ourselves.

We must provide a law that will compel them to go into court or compel the Treasury Department to go into court, or somebody to go into court; but under the existing order of things that in some cases is impossible. Take, for example, the case of the Williamsport Wire Rope Co. under the relief sections of the 1917 and 1918 acts. In that case it was held that the court had no jurisdiction to review the action of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue. However, the court held that the Board of Tax Appeals has such jurisdiction. In certain special assessment cases it has been held by the Supreme Court of the United States that there is no appeal and that no court has jurisdiction to reverse or modify the conclusions arrived at by the commissioner.

So this is all just a hullabaloo about nothing. As I have stated before, and wish to repeat, the only thing that striking down this appropriation could accomplish would be to deny the thousands of citizens throughout the United States, who are entitled to refunds, the opportunity of having the money paid to them promptly when it is found due.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD. I yield.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. All of these settlements have not been in favor of the claimants, have they?

Mr. WOOD. No.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. I wish the gentleman would give us some figures on that.

Mr. WOOD. I can not give the gentleman the proportion that has been either affirmed or denied, but I will say to the Members of this House that for every dollar of refund we are making we are collecting more than four times that amount in back taxes; so that the amount collected on these back taxes, to which the Government is entitled, exceeds the amount of refunds made down to this time; in other words, the amount of the refunds since 1917 is $975,000,000 as compared with over $4,000,000,000 collected from back taxes. The amount of taxes refunded is about 2.5 per cent of the whole amount collected during this period.

If this were a claim where $100 was involved, and the same principle was involved, would anybody raise any question about it? If that is so, why should we differentiate between this corporation—and it is a corporation—and an individual? Why should we differentiate because the amount is large or whether it is small, if we have confidence in the gentlemen whose duty it is to make the computations and arrive at the amount that should be repaid?

Investigations and audits are constantly in process, and as overpayments or underpayments of tax are discovered it is essential that the correction be made as promptly and honorably as possible in order that the taxpayer shall pay to the Government that which he owes or that the Government may pay as promptly as possible to the taxpayer that which has been erroneously or illegally taken from him. During all this time when refunds of $975,000,000 have been made, not one objection has ever come from anybody on this floor or from the Joint Tax Committee or anywhere else.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. There is no particular case before us for consideration under the bill. It is just a deficiency appropriation to pay refund of taxes generally, and we have no particular case before us to decide.

Mr. WOOD. Absolutely not, and we can not have that. It is simply setting up a straw man and tearing it down, and, as I said at the outset of my remarks, I can not for the life of me understand why the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] has worked himself up to such a pitch as he has done in trying to present his ideas with reference to this case.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD. Yes.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Would the gentleman be willing to accept an amendment to the $75,000,000 appropriation, a limitation to the effect that none of this money shall be used to pay claims in excess of $75,000 until the joint committee has had an opportunity to investigate the claims that are referred to it? That would take care of everybody under $75,000.

Mr. WOOD. That is just exactly what you have now.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. You will get a chance to vote on that. You are talking about these little fellows that are to be deprived of their money. This would deprive nobody of any money who has a claim that is not over $75,000 until the joint committee can make an investigation.

Mr. CRAMTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD. Yes.

Mr. CRAMTON. The gentleman from Texas is a very powerful member of the joint committee; does he think or has the House any reason to think that the record of accomplishment of that joint committee up to date is such as to warrant our telling a great many people they must wait for their money pending some investigation that may not be made?

Mr. GARNER of Texas. No; I said when I had the floor that I agreed with my friend from Indiana that the committee is not worth a darn the way it is working now, but I am hoping to get some improvement and this limitation will give an improvement.

Mr. WOOD. I can not see how your proposal would bring about any improvement. It is not different from what you have already in the law. The gentleman is a member of that joint committee. By reason of his expert knowledge, his seniority, and the respect everybody has for him, I wonder how long it would take the gentleman to examine into the United States Steel Corporation case or the American Tobacco Co. case or the Insurance Co. cases. The gentleman would and could not do it. The gentleman would tell them all to take the taxes and go plumb to; that he had enough to do to attend to his own legislative business.

Here is one of the great problems we have, and I want to call your attention especially to this. Under this tax-refund reporting section of the 1928 revenue act we are getting the Congress, as a legislative body, mixed up with the executive departments of this Government in executive duties; and it is a bad practice and one that we ought to get away from. The Congress of the United States should have nothing to do with the execution of the laws of the United States. When we have passed the law we have done our duty, and it ought to be up to the other branch to execute it; because, whenever you involve the Congress of the United States as a partner in the execution of the law, then you are treading upon very dangerous ground, and you are undermining the very foundation upon which the Government was originated. You are inviting, if you please, all sorts of dissension—political and otherwise.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD. Yes.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Does the gentleman take the position that Congress ought never to make an investigation of an executive branch of the Government under any conditions?

Mr. WOOD. No; not at all.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. How can you get your information in any other way? You have got to make an investigation to ascertain whether the laws are being properly executed.

Mr. WOOD. That is quite a different thing. Making an inquiry to see whether the laws are being properly executed as compared with our being a part of the execution of the laws is quite different. That is just exactly what I am complaining about. It is our duty, if we find the laws passed by the Congress are not being properly executed, to inquire into the facts and find out the facts and to provide or to suggest a remedy.

I believe the gentleman, upon reflection, will agree with me that the Congress of the United States ought to keep aloof from the executive departments.

There ought to be just as wide a divergence there as there is between any encroachment of the legislative upon the executive or the executive upon the judicial. If we will hew to that line we will save ourselves a great deal of trouble and save the American people a great deal of woe.

Here is another thing I want to call the attention of the House to in connection with this case.

When once the Commissioner of Internal Revenue has determined in some of these cases that a refund is due, then if the commissioner does not proceed to remand it, the taxpayer can bring a suit to recover in the courts, but he can only recover the amount that the commissioner has found due him.

Now, maybe that is not right. It may be there ought to be a more liberal right given him. If it should be, this is the agency that should give it to him, and if a better way can be found than that which has been practiced since the adoption of this revenue law down to this goodly hour for ascertaining what is right with reference to invested capital, what is right with reference to combinations of principals and subsidiaries, it is up to the Congress of the United States to provide it. If any good is going to come out of this discussion, it will be by awakening the conscience of the responsible parties and bringing about an inquiry into the facts as to whether or not we have provided the proper machinery for the enforcement of this law.

Everybody knows that for the first four or five years it was impossible to find any two auditors that would come to the same conclusion upon the same given set of facts even with reference to small individual returns. There was this confusion with respect to the administration of the law.

By reason of this long practice, by reason of the expertness of those employed in the Treasury Department, and by reason of the experts that these large corporations and large business houses have had in expert men to make out their returns and study these laws, they have simplified it so that it is not half the job to-day that it was 10 years ago. There is yet room for improvement. In my opinion they could simplify the tax-return sheet so that almost any man with average intelligence could make out his own return. I daresay that there is not one-tenth of the Members of this House who could make out a tax return.

Now, criticism has been made against the Appropriations Committee that it was the duty of that committee to inquire into these refunds. Why, gentlemen, would they have us bring up cartloads and truckloads of these manuscripts and set somebody that we had confidence in to delve into those things to see whether a proper conclusion had been reached? It would take more time than all of the other business of the Appropriations Committee, and you would not have any confidence in us after you had got our results for the reason that there would not be sufficient time or information to make up the reports or come to sound conclusions.

Gentlemen, the Steel Corporation has been alive to its own interests and properly so, and has adopted this policy—that whenever an assessment was made against them by the Government they paid it. They have done so because if they did not interest would run against them. By paying it the Government has to pay this interest. That is the reason why you have $11,000,000 interest which the Government has to pay. Mr. Bond testified before our committee, and Mr. HAWLEY has made the statement before you, that in his opinion it is the best possible settlement that could have been made. It not only settles everything for 1917 but it settles the possibility of a lawsuit involving $101,000,000 for principal and $60,000,000 for interest. And yet criticism is made by reason of the fact that they bargain across the table.

Mr. Bond has described the manner in which these settlements are made. They are not compromises in the sense that a compromise is made, but when the facts are so close and there is a reasonable ground for dispute as to who is right and who is wrong, like business men, they settle and try to obviate the possibility of a lawsuit. Under the law, it is the duty to resolve every doubt in favor of the taxpayer.

Mr. LOZIER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD. Yes.

Mr. LOZIER. The trouble comes in the application of the law to the disputed facts when the settlement is made in the manner these settlements are made. No formula or rule has definitely or legally been established for the future guidance of the Treasury. Does not public policy demand that the matter be submitted to the Supreme Court for final arbitrament to the end that a definite formula shall be established to govern the cases?

Mr. WOOD. Here is the trouble. There are so many things entering into the cases. They tell me that they are as different as it is possible to conceive. This Congress has been trying since the beginning of this scheme of taxation to legislate some plan, some simplification, and we have not accomplished it.

After all the men charged with this duty who have acquainted themselves with the facts and then tried to apply the law as they understand it, I expect come as nearly to arriving at a proper conclusion as any court in the United States. If we have the right kind of auditors, experts, lawyers, and engineers, if we have honest men handling these cases, the Government is not going to be cheated out of much.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. It has been brought out here that there is a good deal of delay in passing on these cases. With the United States Steel Corporation the delay has been so great that there is included here $11,000,000 for interest. Could not that delay be very much diminished if the force in the Treasury Department should be amplified?

Mr. WOOD. Yes; we asked Mr. Bond that question, and he says that this case has been expedited as much as it possibly could be. They picked out the best auditors, the best engineers, the best experts, and told them to stick to the business, and they have done nothing else.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the following sums are appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to supply urgent deficiencies in certain appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929, and prior fiscal years, to provide urgent supplemental appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929, and for other purposes, namely.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. LEHLBACH, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 15848, making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in certain appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929, and had come to no resolution thereon.

SPEECH OF HON. JOHN Q. TILSON

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may have printed in the RECORD the speech of the Hon. JOHN Q. TILSON, the majority leader of the House of Representatives, made before the Connecticut State Chamber of Commerce at Hartford, Conn., on December 27, 1928.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oregon asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing therein an address delivered by the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON]. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD I include the following speech of Hon. JOHN Q. TILSON, majority leader of the House of Representatives, before the Connecticut State Chamber of Commerce at Hartford, Conn., December 27, 1928:

TARIFF REVISION

Mr. TILSON. I have consented to come here and speak to the manufacturers and other business men of Connecticut on this occasion because I believe that thereby I may be able to help, and it is with this purpose alone in view that I have come to you.

You have seen something in the papers in regard to a probable revision of the tariff at an extra session of Congress to be held either immediately or some time after the coming of the new administration. In order that you may the better understand the present situation I think it would be well for me to spend a few minutes in giving you something of the background and genesis of the agitation for tariff revision. You will recall that during the last session of the present Congress, when the farm-relief question was very acute, a resolution was introduced by Senator MCMASTER, of South Dakota, in effect calling for an immediate drastic, downward revision of what the resolution characterized as the excessive tariff duties. After considerable discussion this resolution was passed in the Senate by something like a two-thirds vote. The Democrats voted for it almost, if not quite, solidly, as did a number of other Senators including those posing as special friends of the farmer.

The McMaster resolution having passed the Senate came over to the House. It was then only a few weeks before the dates set for the two national conventions, and it was perfectly obvious that no general revision of the tariff could be made prior to the conventions or in fact prior to the general election in November, and that if it were attempted it would simply mean a session of Congress largely devoted to partisan politics lasting right up to the election. Our good Democratic friends at any rate and doubtless some of the others intended by the move, and very closely too, to embarrass the Republicans by precipitating a general tariff revision to be carried out simultaneously with the presidential campaign. A number of the Republican friends of the farmer in the House, some of them in a spirit of sheer desperation, were ready to grasp at any straw that gave the slightest hope of relieving the situation and so were inclined to vote to the resolution. Finally by the narrow margin of eight votes, as I remember, the resolution was in effect laid on the table, thus removing for the time being the menace of undertaking a revision of the tariff under instructions from both Houses of Congress to revise it downward.

I have cited thus briefly the history of the McMaster resolution in order to show that there was at that time some sentiment for tariff revision among the farmers of the West, or at any rate among those purporting to represent them, that was not altogether friendly to protection as a national policy. While the discussion was going on it became apparent that there were insistent demands for tariff revision coming from other parts of the country and from industries other than farming. The result was, and I am violating no pledge of secrecy in saying so now, that a sort of understanding grew up at that time that in case the immediate revision was deferred until a more opportune occasion, an early general revision, including both agriculture and other industries, should be undertaken. No pledge of this sort was, of course, made, for no one had the right or the authority to make such a pledge, but the feeling existed that this was what should be done and that feeling has grown.

Tariff revision was referred to in the Republican platform adopted at Kansas City where it says, "We reaffirm our belief in the protective tariff as a fundamental and essential principle of the economic life of this Nation. While certain provisions of the present law require revision in the light of changes in the world competitive situation since its enactment, the record of the United States since 1922 clearly shows that the fundamental protective principle of the law has been fully justified."

During the campaign the subject was referred to very often, so that it may well be said that the party that was successful at the polls won out with the widespread understanding that a general revision of the tariff should be undertaken. Fortunately, the party platform and the campaign waged upon the platform, coupled with the sweeping victory, all made it clear that what was really wanted was a revision along protective lines. It was often stated during the campaign that the tariff policy of the Republican Party was, and is, to give adequate, necessary protection to every legitimate industry.

In connection with tariff revision I should mention the subject of farm-relief legislation, for the two have been closely associated throughout the discussion of the farm-relief question, it being contended, and I believe rightly, that a proper adjustment of tariff duties on many farm products would be most helpful to that industry. During the campaign farm-relief legislation was being urged from many quarters and Mr. Hoover in his campaign utterances tentatively promised that if satisfactory farm-relief legislation were not enacted before he came into office, he would call Congress into extra session for the purpose of considering the general subject. I do not regard it as probable that satisfactory farm legislation will be enacted during the present session of Congress, and this largely because those who have been most insistent upon immediate farm relief have taken the attitude that they prefer to wait until Mr. Hoover actually becomes President, or as some have expressed it, they would prefer to take their chances of favorable legislation from Hoover rather than from Coolidge. Whether or not they are correct in this time may tell. I do know, however, that President Coolidge has been and is most desirious of seeing proper farm-relief legislation enacted, and I am sure would be glad to approve a sound bill; but as I have said, there is little likelihood of such legislation now. It is, therefore, in my judgment, most probable that Mr. Hoover will redeem the campaign pledge of calling Congress together in extra session to consider the entire question of farm relief, which it is conceded includes tariff revision.

Any satisfactory revision of our tariff laws must cover the entire field because many of the items are interrelated and the rates more or less interdependent. Therefore it would be impracticable to select a few items, or even a few of the schedules, and revise these without at the same time considering all the others so as to be sure that the rates are not thrown out of balance. The revision at the present time, however, need not be a long drawn out or so difficult a task as it has been in the past because the conditions are much more favorable than is usually the case.

Ordinarily, our tariff bills have been written alternately by the party favoring protection and the party professing adherence to a tariff for revenue only. Usually, when the protection party comes into power it is necessary to prepare a tariff bill along entirely different lines to supplant a law written on a tariff-for-revenue-only basis. The reverse of this is true when the tariff-for-revenue-only party comes into power. In the present instance a protective tariff law is on the statute books which, on the whole, has operated quite successfully. The main structure of the present law need not be changed, but it has been seven years since that law was enacted and conditions in many industries have changed, necessitating corresponding changes in the law. Our present task is simply to make the changes necessary to fit the changed conditions, leaving the basic structure of the law as it now stands.

In order to be ready for an early revision of the tariff in case an early extra session is called, the House Committee on Ways and Means of the present Congress is to begin on January 7 hearings preparatory to the early general revision of the tariff. These hearings do not bind the incoming President to call an extra session and it is possible, though I do not regard it as probable, that such hearings might demonstrate that no tariff revision is needed at this time. Believing, however, that the extra session will be called and that tariff revision will be had, I wish to say a few words as to what I think the attitude of the country should be toward such revision, and especially what the attitude of the manufacturers of this part of the country should be toward it.

I speak as a Republican and a protectionist. I could not speak otherwise and speak truly, so that any old-fashioned Democrats present whose views do not fully coincide with mine on this subject will have to make the necessary allowance, taking into the account my viewpoint, which has been frankly stated. I believe that as conditions now are in our own country and in foreign countries, an American system of protective-tariff duties is most necessary, or, at any rate, highly desirable. I believe that if the country were deprived of such a system we should be in for a period of depression the end of which no one could possibly foresee. What should be done, then, that a tariff bill may be written carrying rates that are fair, adequate, and yet only such as may be necessary for the proper protection of the countless number and variety of articles produced by our immensely varied industries? In the first place, I think that we should take the position that protection is a national policy and that it should apply with equal force to every industry in the country that can properly bring itself within the protective-tariff principle. We in New England should favor proper protection for farming, mining, and other industries, just as we ask and need it for purely manufacturing industries. A policy of protection must be based upon principles broad enough to cover the Nation or it can not stand.

Our manufacturers can help very materially in the preparation of tariff schedules that will stand the test of time and thorough investigation. All that is necessary is that Congress shall be furnished with the material facts so that the tariff rates proposed and adopted may be based upon such facts and upon as thorough knowledge as possible of the conditions surrounding each particular industry, both in this country and abroad. It is necessary that these facts be carefully prepared and that they be properly presented in a way to inspire the confidence of the committees of Congress in charge of the revision, the Members of both Houses of Congress, and the country generally. For, after all, the tariff law, like any other law, if it is to command respect, should be backed up by sound public opinion, and this public opinion in order to endure must be based securely upon the facts.

In presenting to Congress the needs of the several industries great care should be exercised that the case be neither overstated nor understated. If understated, and rates are based upon such understatement, then the protection given will not be sufficient and the result will be unsatisfactory, as was the case in a few instances in the revision of 1921–22. On the other hand, if the case be overstated, the close and critical scrutiny which is sure to be given every item by both friends and foes of the tariff, will surely reveal the exaggeration of the need for protection, and the error will recoil upon the heads of those giving the inaccurate information to the injury of the industry that has been thus misrepresented.

In the revision of 1921–22 I served as chairman of the subcommittee on both the metal schedule and the sundries schedule. Many manufacturers, importers, and others interested in the revision came before my subcommittee. I then strove to impress them all with the fact that what the committee needed was accurate information as to the actual condition of the particular industry and as thorough knowledge as possible of the facts upon which the claim of need for protection is predicated. Some of the manufacturers at that time underestimated their need and some of these have been penalized for their moderation. Some, a very few, I am glad to say, overstated their case as to the need for protection, and I am glad to say that they, in practically every instance of overstatement, were discovered in time to prevent erroneous action, but if some of these latter ones suffered on account of their exaggerated claims, they had no one to blame but themselves.

If the tariff is revised during the Seventy-first Congress, it will be the first time in many years that a revision has taken place without the presence of a Connecticut man on either the Ways and Means Committee of the House or the Finance Committee of the Senate, the two committees of Congress having charge of tariff matters. In the last revision I represented Connecticut on the committee in the House while Senator McLEAN represented our State in the Senate.

Four years ago I was promoted to the leadership of the House, and now Senator McLEAN, of his own volition, is leaving the Senate. I wish to assure you, however, that every possible effort will be made to properly safeguard the interests of Connecticut in connection with the tariff bill. As floor leader of the House I am permitted, through conference and otherwise, to exercise my persuasive powers with the committees of the House as a sort of member ex officio of the committee. In view of the great interests of our State and of my familiarity with the subject, owing to the active part taken by me in the last revision, I shall avail myself of the privilege of conferring with the Ways and Means Committee as often as possible when matters directly affecting Connecticut are being considered. I shall, also, through my constant touch with the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, try to keep track of the work of the committee as nearly as possible as though I were still a member of it.

I appeal to the manufacturers and other business men of Connecticut, who are particularly interested in the prospective revision of the tariff and are in position to do so, to give the kind of help that I have already indicated. In any event I appeal to you to consider the entire tariff question on a broad-minded, country-wide basis, remembering, as I stated at the outset, that this is a national policy, that we are but a part of a great country, bound together by strong common interests, and that our interests in the last analysis and in the long run are the same as the interests of all other parts of the country. I believe that New England, and especially Connecticut, will take this broad-minded, businesslike, statesmanlike view of the subject.

SENATE

The Chaplain, Rev. ZeBarney T. Phillips, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Shepherd of Israel, who dost neither slumber nor sleep, we are the people of Thy pasture and the sheep of Thy hand. Make us to love Thy voice and answer to the name by which Thou callest us; so shall none be able to pluck us out of Thy hand. Beside the still waters, through pastures green, and in the valley where deep shadows lie, be Thou our strength and shield; and do Thou shepherd us beyond the plains of peril to the eternal fold where we may lie down in peace and take our rest, for it is Thou only that makest us dwell in safety. Grant this for the sake of Him who is the Lamb of God, Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

ORGANIZED LABOR'S RADIO STATION

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I have a letter from the manager of the WCFL Radio Magazine, of Chicago, Ill., setting forth the claims of the labor-union station for larger power and for a clear channel for radio purposes. I do not care to read all the letter, but I do want to read certain parts of it which discuss the place that radio holds as a great resource of the American people:

This is the last great public domain. A few squatters have set up their tents, turned a few furrows, and now ask the Nation to confirm in them title to a continent. What do they care for the "public interest, necessity, and convenience"? What they want is to make money, to acquire power and to control in their interest this unparalleled new means of communication.

Never in our history has there been such a bold and brazen attempt to seize control of the means of communication and to dominate public opinion as is now going on in the field of radio broadcasting. And never in our history has the Federal Government shown such a crass disregard and contempt for the rights of those who toil.

This is a battle of the giants. On the one hand stands organized capital seeking to grasp and monopolize for itself, for commercial profit and for propaganda in its own interest, this vast and immeasurably valuable means of communication. On the other hand stands organized labor, armed with right and justice, battling for some measure of freedom of speech and freedom of the air, and for the right to have 1 out of the 89 broadcasting channels left open for the dissemination of the principles, policies, and ideals for which organized labor stands. It seeks no profit; it wants no commercial gain, but it does want an opportunity to serve the workingmen of the country, and through them, the Nation at large.

Then, this letter goes on to discuss in such a remarkable manner what constitutes public interest that I want to read another portion of it, as follows:

What is the "public interest, necessity, and convenience" which the law fixes as the sole test for granting radio licenses? Certainly it is the same as the "public welfare." That which contributes to the health, comfort, and happiness of the people is in the public interest. That which provides wholesome entertainment, increases knowledge, arouses individual thinking, inspires noble impulses, strengthens human ties, breaks down hatreds, encourages respect for law, is in the public interest. That which aids employment, improves the standard of living, and adds to the peace and content of mankind is in the public interest.

Is it in the public interest, necessity, and convenience that this marvelous new means of communication should be placed within the control of a few great corporations? Or handed out as a free gift to a few hundred private business concerns for commercial exploitation? Or sucked into the maw of great metropolitan newspapers, already in uncontrolled possession of power that threatens the welfare of the country? Is the public interest, necessity, and convenience to be determined by noisy acclaim? If so, then the movies overwhelm the universities, and are themselves outranked by a ball game or a prize fight. The cheapest sex novel would then put to shame the greatest scientific treatise.

Is it in the public interest, necessity, and convenience that Bill Jones, of Podunk, have a radio station to advertise his garage? Or that a great public utility monopoly operate a 50,000-watt station to further its interests?

Is it a matter of public necessity that 20 radio stations in one city pound the air with the same jazz tunes?

The "public interest, necessity, and convenience" is nation-wide. It is age long. It has to do with the physical, mental, moral, social, and economic welfare of all of the people. It is not greatly concerned with Bill Jones's garage, or the private profit which a station owner hopes to derive from his broadcasting operations. It is not enhanced by the granting of special favors to a few individuals or corporations, however rich and powerful they may be.

The "public interest, necessity, and convenience" requires that radio broadcasting provide not only entertainment but information, not only music but science, history, economics, and all the other things that make for human welfare. It requires that the serious problems of life shall be presented, not from one group or one viewpoint only, but from many groups and many points of view.

The great things of civilization are not sob songs nor symphony orchestras. They are matters that have to do with employment, with home life, with health, with the standard of living, with great economic and industrial problems that enter into the web and woof of the daily existence of all the people. To serve the public interest radio must pour into the homes of the Nation not only entertainment but something that will help solve the practical problems of everyday life.

Is it in the public interest, necessity, and convenience that all of the 89 channels for radio broadcasting be given to capital and its friends and not even 1 channel to the millions who toil? Will the public interest be served by opening all channels of communication to those who employ and denying any channel of communication to the vast group of employed?

I may say that in the allocation of radio stations made by the commission in November this one labor station was allowed 1,500 watts of power and was permitted to broadcast on a wave length during the daylight period, but forbidden to broadcast after the sun went down on the Pacific coast. In other words, the labor station, designed to serve and reach the laboring people in the central part of the United States, was not allowed to broadcast during the nighttime, the only time when the great masses of the laboring people can listen to the programs.

They have appealed for a full, clear channel. They appealed for 50,000 watts of power. I am informed this morning that in the last two or three days the commission has granted a permit to this station to build a 50,000-watt power station, but has not granted it the right to rebroadcast on a short wave length, in order that it may set up the little stations throughout the country on the same wave length and reach all sections of the United States.

This particular letter makes an appeal that they may be allowed to broadcast their programs all over the country, not by hogging a great lot of channels in the air, but by using a short wave length to rebroadcast their programs to stations of small power located in small towns, which will reproduce the programs on the same wave length that the Chicago station is using, and thus their chain programs will be on the same wave length in every part of the United States.

It seems to me that when any radio organization offering entertainment and information to the people proposes to do it by serving the whole country on one channel when there is such a shortage of channels, the Radio Commission should encourage that station to go ahead and demonstrate what can be done.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield.

Mr. DILL. I yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. McKELLAR. I have read the very remarkable letter to which the Senator calls attention. It is a very strong and able letter, and I am glad the Senator is going to put it in the RECORD. I think every Senator should read the letter. However, what I want to ask the Senator is this: What reason has been advanced by the Radio Commission why this station should not be granted the right, in a substantial way, at any rate, that it seeks?

Mr. DILL. I am unable to answer the Senator's question, because I was not present when the refusal was made. I do know, however, that the objection is made to their broadcasting after sundown that it would interfere with a station, KJR, in Seattle, on the Pacific coast, that has 5,000 watts, while this little station has 1,500 watts. In the first place, the interference would be so small that nine-tenths of the country would not know it; and, in the second place, it seems to me that the commission ought to recognize the importance of having one station at least that is under the control of organized labor which may broadcast the ideals and principles for which labor stands to the millions of working people of this country during the nighttime, the only time when the great masses of the people can listen to it.

Mr. McKELLAR. I agree with the Senator entirely. He has been very active in all radio legislation and has done splendid work in regard to it, and I hope he will take the lead in seeing to it that this organization has proper rights accorded it under the law.

Mr. DILL. I must say to the Senator in reply to his suggestion that my business is to try to frame and assist in passing radio legislation and not to try to administer it. The Radio Commission is charged with that duty. I am always ready to give it suggestions, but it seems to me that it should be able to work out a system whereby a station of this kind may be taken care of in the broadcasting spectrum.

Mr. McKELLAR. I, too, think so; but if for any reason that can not be done, it is our duty to enact such legislation as will compel it to be done.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. DILL. I yield.

Mr. HEFLIN. If when the facts have been submitted, and the Radio Commission turns down a request that is so reasonable and fair as this, if the appeal of organized labor does not move the commission, I think the Senate can adopt a resolution condemning the commission for its conduct.

Mr. DILL. Of course the Senate could adopt such a resolution and grant a wave length if it saw fit, but I do not think that is necessary. I want to call attention to the fact that the great Radio Trust, composed of certain large organizations that have made agreements in control of radio—the General Electric Co., the Westinghouse Co., the American Telegraph & Telephone Co., the United Fruit Corporation, and the Radio Corporation of America—have six clear channels, to say nothing of the chain-station rights which they have, to extend their programs all over the country; and they are granted those channels for unlimited use, with tremendous power of from 25,000 to 50,000 watts, while the labor station, located as it is in the center of the country at Chicago, has been limited to 1,500 watts, and limited to broadcasting during the daylight hours.

Having granted Mr. Insull's company a permit for 50,000 watts in Chicago, which divides the time with the Prairie Farmer station of 50,000 watts, the effect was such as practically to drown out the little labor station. So the commission has granted a permit to it to build a 50,000-watt station, but as yet has refused to grant them the short wave length upon which they can rebroadcast their programs throughout the Nation to little stations which will use the one-wave length.

Mr. President, I will not take more time, but will ask to have the letter printed in full at this point in the RECORD following my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The letter entire is as follows:

WCFL RADIO MAGAZINE,
Chicago, Ill., January 5, 1929.

Hon. C. C. DILL,
United States Senator, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: Radio broadcasting is the most effective means known to man for influencing public opinion. When the President speaks over the radio he is listened to intently by more people than read all the daily newspapers in the land. The mind can not conceive of the influence radio is destined to exert upon the thinking, the habits, the character, and the progress of mankind.

Radio takes its place alongside of the development of the printing press and the establishment of the public school. It is the super means of entertainment, education, and propaganda. Whoever controls radio broadcasting in the years to come will control the Nation. For good or ill, radio will pour into the homes of the land, into the minds and hearts of the people a constant stream of song and story, of history, science, economics, politics, and propaganda. Overshadowing and outreaching all other means of communication, radio has become the unrivaled master of human destiny.

Like the air we breathe or the sunlight that gives us life, radio must be charged with a public trust—the heritage of mankind. No man or corporation may appropriate it, any more than he could appropriate the air or the ocean. Granted that under our law a man may patent a mechanical invention and limit its use, he can not use his patented device in interstate commerce without the consent of the Congress of the United States. Radio being a form of interstate communication is therefore under the exclusive control of Congress.

A law has been enacted by Congress creating the Federal Radio Commission and delegating to it the power and authority to license persons to operate radio broadcasting stations, when in the judgment of the commission it will be "in the public interest, necessity, and convenience" so to do. By this law the public welfare is the sole basis for determining who shall be allowed to operate a radio station.

Under this authority the Federal Radio Commission has licensed some 650 broadcasting stations, although there are only 89 "wave lengths" or "channels" available for broadcasting in the United States. Forty of these channels are set apart as "cleared" channels; that is, only one station broadcasts on one of these channels at a time. In many instances a single station is granted an "exclusive" channel; that is, it has the sole use of that channel 24 hours a day. Stations on "cleared channels" are allowed to use high power up to 50,000 watts. These furnish fairly good service for a distance of about 500 miles, but they interfere with other stations in the same channel for 3,000 miles or more. The interference or "nuisance" range of any broadcasting station is about ten times its service range.

The great majority of the stations are limited to low power, and are placed on channels occupied by several other stations, being so spaced geographically as to reduce interference to a minimum. They are merely local stations, with a dependable service radius of 10 to 100 miles. Occasionally a station may be heard at great distances, but not with any regularity, and such long-distance reception is of little practical use.

Now, let us see who has been granted licenses by the Federal Radio Commission to exercise this precious franchise. Who have been deemed best qualified to serve the "public interest, necessity, and convenience"?

First, there is a group of five great corporations which have formed an alliance by mutual contracts and "cross licenses" of patent rights to secure control of the whole field of radio patents and of the manufacture of radio equipment. This group controls jointly more than 2,000 radio patents. It has become commonly known as the Radio Trust. No one can make a radio receiving set or operate a broadcasting station in the United States without having first purchased the privilege from some or all of this group. The Radio Trust is composed of General Electric Co., Westinghouse Electric & Manufacturing Co., American Telephone & Telegraph Co., United Fruit Corporation, and Radio Corporation of America, which is the pooling and selling agent for the other members. Recently the Federal courts have held the Radio Corporation guilty of monopolizing the sale of radio tubes on which the patents had expired.

The combined assets of this group exceed $3,000,000,000. These members of the Radio Trust have been licensed by the Federal Radio Commission to operate the following stations:

GENERAL ELECTRIC CO.

Station KGO, at Oakland, Calif., with 10,000 watts power on a cleared channel, with unlimited time of operation; also

Station KOA, at Denver, with 12,500 watts power, cleared channel and unlimited time; also Station WGY, at Schenectady, N. Y., with 50,000 watts power, for which it is now fighting in the courts for a third cleared exclusive channel, with unlimited time of operation.

WESTINGHOUSE ELECTRIC & MANUFACTURING CO.

Station KDKA, at Pittsburgh, with 50,000 watts power, a cleared channel and unlimited time of operation; also Station WBZ, at East Springfield, Mass., with 15,000 watts power, cleared channel and unlimited time of operation.

Station WBZA, at Boston, Mass., on the same channel; it also owns Station KYW, at Chicago, with 5,000 watts power on a cleared channel. This station it leases to the Chicago Herald Examiner.

In connection with station KYW, it also owns station KFKX, making in all five stations owned by the Westinghouse Co.

THE RADIO CORPORATION OF AMERICA

Owns station WJZ, near New York City, with 30,000 watts power, a cleared channel and unlimited time of operation.

It also owns and operates station WRC at Washington.

The three companies above named have formed and own the National Broadcasting Co., which owns and operates station WEAF, near New York, with 50,000 watts power, a cleared channel and unlimited time of operation.

In short, the members of the Radio Trust own and operate some 11 stations with an aggregate of about 220,000 watts of power, and are granted the exclusive use of 6 or 7 out of the 89 available channels in the United States.

By means of so-called chain hook-ups the stations owned by the Radio Trust tie into their control some 50 or more of the leading radio broadcasting stations in the United States—practically all of those which have more than a local service range.

Other manufacturers of and dealers in radio supplies have been granted licenses for about 60 broadcasting stations. Some of these have cleared channels with a maximum of 50,000 watts power.

About 25 or 30 of the great metropolitan newspapers have been granted licenses to operate broadcasting stations on very choice wave channels. In Chicago alone there are the following:

Chicago Tribune Co., station WGN, with 25,000 watts power, cleared channel and unlimited time of operation.

The Chicago Daily News, station WMAQ, 5,000 watts power, cleared channel and unlimited time of operation.

The Chicago Herald Examiner leases station KYW from the Westinghouse Co., 5,000 watts power, cleared channel.

The Chicago Evening American, cooperates with station WBBM, a station which has a cleared channel, 25,000 watts power, part-time service.

The Prairie Farmer owns and operates station WLS, 50,000 watts power, cleared channel, but is required to divide time with the Insull Power Trust's station, WENR, also using 50,000 watts power.

Approximately 350 licenses have been issued to various private business concerns, entirely local in character, many of them of trifling importance even in their own communities.

More than 40 local churches have been granted broadcasting licenses. About 70 educational institutions, some mere local high schools, have been licensed. Thirty local chambers of commerce and similar organizations hold broadcasting licenses. The rest of the 650 or more broadcasting licenses have been granted to miscellaneous persons of no importance.

In view of the foregoing we have now to state an astounding and well-nigh unbelievable fact:

Organized labor, with some 4,000,000 of members and comprising with their families almost a fifth of the entire population of the country, and representing not only its actual membership but the many millions of men and women who toil, has asked the Federal Radio Commission for just one channel of the 89 available in this country, together with ample power and adequate time of operation. The Federal Radio Commission has denied this petition and has granted to organized labor's station WCFL at Chicago, which has been built and supported during the past three years by voluntary contributions of labor unions and listeners, the right to broadcast on only 1,500 watts power during the daytime only! In view of the fact that working men and women do not return from their work until after 6 o'clock in the evening, it is manifest that the limitation put upon the station by the Federal Radio Commission practically destroys its usefulness.

In other words, the Federal Radio Commission takes the position that organized labor, notwithstanding the vast number of people who constitute its membership; notwithstanding the unparalleled service it has rendered to workingmen and to the general public in the past 50 years; notwithstanding the fact that it has principles, policies, and ideals of the utmost value to society which it wishes to promulgate; notwithstanding the fact that the working people of the country with their families constitute 90 per cent of its population and the very bone and sinew of the Nation; notwithstanding the fact that all other radio broadcasting stations of any importance, as well as the newspapers of the country, are owned by capital and are almost unanimous in their opposition to the ideals and principles of organized labor; notwithstanding the fact that organized labor is not seeking to make a profit from this station but is seeking solely to render a public service, nevertheless the Federal Radio Commission in its wisdom has seen fit to deny this great institution one single broadcasting channel out of the 89 available, while pouring into the lap of the Radio Trust six or seven such channels, with unlimited time of operation, besides numerous other broadcasting stations with part-time operation.

Metropolitan newspapers, which already have a powerful means of communication but which are nevertheless local institutions, are handed the choicest wave lengths, with ample power and unlimited time of operation. Hundreds of private individuals and corporations who are seeking solely to make a private commercial profit out of this divine gift to mankind are granted choice channels with ample power and time of operation. But the great body of millions of workingmen in the country, represented in the American Federation of Labor and its affiliated organizations, are told that it is not "in the public interest, necessity, and convenience" for them to have a voice on the air!

This is the last great public domain. A few squatters have set up their tents, turned a few furrows, and now ask the Nation to confirm in them title to a continent! What do they care for the "public interest, necessity, and convenience"? What they want is to make money, to acquire power, and to control in their interest this unparalleled new means of communication.

Never in our history has there been such a bold and brazen attempt to seize control of the means of communication and to dominate public opinion as is now going on in the field of radio broadcasting. And never in our history has the Federal Government shown such a crass disregard and contempt for the rights of those who toil.

This is a battle of the giants. On the one hand stands organized capital seeking to grasp and monopolize for itself, for commercial profit and for propaganda in its own interest, this vast and immeasurably valuable means of communication. On the other hand stands organized labor, armed with right and justice, battling for some measure of freedom of speech and freedom of the air, and for the right to have 1 out of the 89 broadcasting channels left open for the dissemination of the principles, policies, and ideals for which organized labor stands. It seeks no profit; it wants no commercial gain, but it does want an opportunity to serve the workingmen of the country, and through them, the Nation at large.

What is the "public interest, necessity, and convenience" which the law fixes as the sole test for granting radio licenses? Certainly it is the same as the "public welfare." That which contributes to the health, comfort, and happiness of the people is in the public interest. That which provides wholesome entertainment, increases knowledge, arouses individual thinking, inspires noble impulses, strengthens human ties, breaks down hatreds, encourages respect for law, is in the public interest. That which aids employment, improves the standard of living, and adds to the peace and content of mankind is in the public interest.

Is it in the public interest, necessity, and convenience that this marvelous new means of communication should be placed within the control of a few great corporations? Or handed out as a free gift to a few hundred private business concerns for commercial exploitation? Or sucked into the maw of great metropolitan newspapers, already in uncontrolled possession of power that threatens the welfare of the country? Is the public interest, necessity, and convenience to be determined by noisy acclaim? If so, then the movies overwhelm the universities, and are themselves outranked by a ball game or a prize fight. The cheapest sex novel would then put to shame the greatest scientific treatise.

Is it in the public interest, necessity, and convenience that Bill Jones of Podunk have a radio station to advertise his garage? Or that a great public utility monopoly operate a 50,000-watt station to further its interests?

Is it a matter of public necessity that 20 radio stations in one city pound the air with the same jazz tunes?

The public interest, necessity, and convenience is nation-wide. It is age-long. It has to do with the physical, mental, moral, social, and economic welfare of all of the people. It is not greatly concerned with Bill Jones's garage, or the private profit which a station owner hopes to derive from his broadcasting operations. It is not enhanced by the granting of special favors to a few individuals or corporations, however rich and powerful they may be.

The public interest, necessity, and convenience requires that radio broadcasting provide not only entertainment but information; not only music but science, history, economics, and all the other things that make for human welfare. It requires that the serious problems of life shall be presented, not from one group or one viewpoint only but from many groups and many points of view.

The great things of civilization are not sob songs nor symphony orchestras. They are matters that have to do with employment, with home life, with health, with the standard of living, with great economic and industrial problems that enter into the web and woof of the daily existence of all the people. To serve the public interest radio must pour into the homes of the Nation not only entertainment but something that will help solve the practical problems of everyday life.

Is it in the public interest, necessity, and convenience that all of the 89 channels for radio broadcasting be given to capital and its friends and not even one channel to the millions who toil? Will the public interest be served by opening all channels of communication to those who employ and denying any channel of communication to the vast group of employed?

Organized labor has contributed immeasurable service to the Nation. It has vastly improved working conditions, raised the standard of living, infused hope and courage and patriotism into millions of hearts. It has battled for needed reforms, sane and useful legislation, and social and economic justice for all who toil. It has established principles, policies, and ideals which are as essential to the welfare of our country as is sunlight to the growing fields. It has a message for all mankind. It asks no monopoly, no special privilege, no right to exploit the air for commercial profit. It asks only that it be allowed to use one of the 89 available radio channels in order that it may freely promulgate its principles and ideals and thereby protect and serve the entire public.

Surely it is in the public interest, necessity, and convenience that this unparalleled means of communication be kept as a sacred heritage for all posterity; that it be not controlled or dominated by any class or group, but rather that every reputable group shall have opportunity to sing its song, tell its story, or proclaim its message to those who desire to hear.

Station WCFL has asked for an exclusive channel and for a permit to erect a 50,000-watt station. If these requests shall be granted, it is intended to erect one of the best stations in the country and to offer a program of music, entertainment, education, and inspiration second to none.

We have also asked for the use of a short-wave channel to be used in rebroadcasting WCFL programs to substations to be erected in various parts of the country, from which the programs will then be rebroadcast on the same wave length as WCFL. By this system we can send our programs into every part of the country without interfering with any other station, and shall serve on one broadcast channel practically the entire Nation. This is a step far in advance of the present practice whereby a nation-wide hook-up requires the use of 30 or 40 channels.

In addition to all of the foregoing, it is an impressive fact that the Farmers Educational and Cooperative Union of America, with affiliated farmers' unions in many States, has entered into a contract with us to participate in the program offerings of WCFL, and to contribute, on a per capita basis, to its support. In this way the farmers of the country will be served by this station more fully and efficiently than by any other radio station. All together, it is not too much to say that when WCFL has completed its broad program—already approved by the best radio engineers in the country—it will serve, with a high degree of efficiency, several times as many people as any other radio station in the world. It is the only radio station in America built and supported by the listeners themselves. It is the only station in the world owned and operated by organized labor.

Respectfully submitted.

ORGANIZED LABOR OF AMERICA,
By CHICAGO FEDERATION OF LABOR,
JOHN FITZPATRICK, President.
C. N. NOCKELS, Secretary.

RADIO BROADCASTING

Mr. BLEASE. Mr. President, in connection with the remarks of the Senator from Washington [Mr. DILL] on the radio situation, I ask to have printed in the RECORD two articles from the Washington Evening Star, one from the issue of December 28 entitled "Chicago Rivals in Radio Battle" and the other from the same paper of the issue of December 5, 1928, entitled "Superpower Hit by Senator DILL."

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CHICAGO RIVALS IN RADIO BATTLE—SENATORS CHARGE GIANT STATION IS PROMOTED FOR UTILITIES PROPAGANDA

By Martin Codel

All the pent-up antagonism toward authorizing certain public-utility interests to engage in radio broadcasting was loosed yesterday at the hearing before the Federal Radio Commission, involving the conflicting demands of stations WENR, operated by the Samuel Insull group in Chicago, and WLS owned by a farm magazine and largely controlled by a leading mail-order house, for rights to use one of the Chicago zone's cleared broadcast channels.

Three United States Senators appeared in opposition to the application of the giant Chicago station, owned by seven public-utility companies, the largest of them the Commonwealth-Edison, for full time on the air with 50,000 watts of power. Senators NORRIS of Nebraska, WALSH of Montana, and BROOKHART of Iowa all based their position on an assertion that "it is against the public interest to give these people another avenue to spread their propaganda."

The tenseness that surrounded this phase of the hearing of three days and three nights on the counterclaims of the two stations was aggravated by a remark by John E. Wing, counsel for WENR, at the conclusion of Senator WALSH'S informal statement before the Radio Commission:

"I would like to ask the Senator," said Mr. Wing after listening to the Montanan's recital of "shocking" disclosures in the Federal Trade Commission's public utility inquiry, "if in the recent elections the people of the United States have not expressed an opinion on attacks upon public utilities?"

NOT ATTACK ON UTILITIES

The question seemed to surprise Senator WALSH for a moment.

"I don't think so," he replied to Mr. Wing.

Then he went on to explain that he did not regard his own attitude or that of the Federal Trade Commission as an attack upon the utilities.

His opposition to permitting WENR to go on the air in preference to a station said to be devoting its time largely to agricultural interests, he said, was due to a careful study he has made of the "propaganda methods" employed by the utility companies as revealed in the Government's investigation.

The broad policy of enabling public utilities to utilize the ether for such an avowed purpose as that of the Chicago group, "creating good will," was strenuously opposed by both Senators NORRIS and BROOKHART. The Iowa Senator declared that he had supported Mr. Hoover in the last election on account of his stand on the farm problem.

"On the question of public utilities," said Senator BROOKHART, "I do not think it was decided at all by this election."

Mr. NORRIS and Mr. BROOKHART both vigorously scored the alleged propaganda against the principle of public ownership, which, they declared, was being carried on by underground methods by the so-called Power Trust. The Radio Commission, listening to the senatorial witnesses on behalf of WLS, heard a complete summarization of revelations in its sister commission's power inquiry of last spring and summer.

AIR CONTROL IS CHARGED

Senator NORRIS charged the utilities with trying "to control the air we breathe" at the expense of agriculture, while Senator BROOKHART declared an attempt was being made to monopolize the Chicago broadcasting situation with the highest power in that region.

"It seems to me," said Senator NORRIS, "that the Power Trust has controlled a good share of the earth and ought to let us have the air. I don't see why the public utilities should be allowed to engage in broadcasting. They are not connected with it even indirectly, unless it is for propaganda purposes."

The broadcasting channels sought by the two stations is now utilized five-sevenths of the time by WLS and two-sevenths by WENR. The latter seeks more time in order to make its operation commercially feasible and wants the maximum power in order to serve a large rural audience in the surrounding territory. Its counsel charges WLS with being controlled by Sears-Roebuck Co., whose contractual arrangement with the station is said to discriminate against its use by any rival mail-order house.

The hearing brought into the open an issue which has been brewing within the Federal Radio Commission for some time, sporadic outbursts until now alone indicating the nature of the controversy that must now be settled. Chairman Robinson was absent from this hearing, but has made it plain that he absolutely opposes WENR's right to be on the air. He has several times questioned the right of a public utility under its charter to expend funds drawn from rate revenues on such a medium as broadcasting. SUPERPOWER HIT BY SENATOR DILL—COAUTHOR OF RADIO ACT DECLARES HIGH-WATT STATIONS RULE AIR

By Martin Codel

Besides considering the fate of the Federal Radio Commission, the present short session of Congress will hear renewed attacks upon high-powered broadcasting. An effort will be made to limit by specific legislation the amount of power a station may employ.

Very little criticism against the reallocation project as a whole has been voiced by returning Members to Congress, but several of the leaders in radio legislation say they have found the use of superpower on the cleared channels highly objectionable. Their complaint is that the superpower stations are making it impossible for many listeners at substations distances away to tune out their programs over exceedingly wide dial ranges.

Senator DILL, coauthor of the radio act, declares he has concrete evidence that the Radio Commission has erred in granting high power. Tuning in WLW, Cincinnati, while in Ohio last week, he found its 50,000-watt transmitter emitting a signal that covered half the dial of a standard high-priced receiving set. Two friends dialing the same station on two other makes of receiver experienced the same trouble.

"Station WLW did not shut out other stations altogether," said Senator DILL, "but its programs could be heard in the background whenever another station was tuned." The Senator from the State of Washington also asserted that his experience with the most recent entrant into the high-power ranks is the same that it is reported to him from competent observers near other superpower stations or within their normal listening ranges.

Something will have to be done to curb this use of high power, Senator DILL maintains. If special legislation is necessary to reduce powers, he declares he will back it. The coauthor of the radio law is severe in his criticism of the Federal Radio Commission for granting high power to many more stations. He said he has learned that certain members of the commission have urged certain stations to seek such power. The leading high-power advocate on the commission is O. H. Caldwell, and Senator DILL declared that his opposition to Commissioner Caldwell had not abated since he fought the New Yorker's confirmation as a member of the radio board last session.

In his opposition to high-power broadcasting, Senator DILL is joined by Representative EWEN DAVIS, of Tennessee, author of the equalization amendment. Mr. DAVIS describes the "blanketing" effects of high power as one of the defects in the present broadcasting structure. He states that adequate service can be furnished by a sufficient number of relatively low-powered stations properly situated throughout the country.

Like Senator DILL, Mr. DAVIS believes that radio listeners addicted to the "DX" habit are in the minority. After the first thrill of distance hunting wears off, most listeners become accustomed to the local or nearby stations they can readily tune in, according to Senator DILL. Then they regularly scan the programs of those stations, make their selections, and fix their dials at the usual point.

INTERMEDIATE CREDIT BANK OF COLUMBIA, S. C.

Mr. BLEASE. Mr. President, I should like to read an article from the Washington Star of yesterday, entitled "Meyer Concludes Great Clean-up."

I should like to call the attention of the members of the Banking and Currency Committee, who made a report on the resolution submitted by me, to the difference between the report thus submitted by them and what Mr. Meyer now says, and see who told the truth in this matter. The article which I desire to read is by William Hard, and is as follows:

[From the Sunday Star, Washington, D. C., January 6, 1929]

MEYER CONCLUDES GREAT CLEAN-UP—FEDERAL FARM LOAN HEAD ENDS QUIET, BUT EFFECTIVE, PURGING OF PROCESS

By William Hard

When it comes to lending oceans of public money to "stabilization corporations" and other agricultural institutions under farm legislation in the Hoover administration, there will be just one man in Washington who will clearly know most about all such problems. That man is Eugene Meyer, present farm loan commissioner of the Federal Government.

Mr. Meyer is just concluding one of the biggest—and yet one of the quietest—clean-ups that has ever happened in the Government's history. In the course of a relatively few months he has ruthlessly housecleaned our Federal land banks, our agricultural intermediate credit banks, and our joint-stock land banks, all coming under the supervision of the Federal Farm Loan Board, of which Mr. Meyer has been the operating executive since the spring of last year.

PURIFYING PROCESS TERRIFIC

Various officers of such banks in various parts of the country have been conveyed to jail—

Quite different from the report signed by this committee—or have been sentenced to jail or are now under indictment or are on their way to indictment. The purifying process has been gigantic and terrific, and yet there has been no making of "sensations" and no exploitation of "scandals" for publicity purposes and no impairment whatsoever of the reputation and credit of our Federal agricultural banking system.

In fact, instead of an impairment, there has been an enhancement. Mr. Meyer is now selling the bonds of the banks under his care at a better figure than was obtainable when he took office and began investigating and prosecuting. When it is remembered that the securities involved in our Federal agricultural banking system have now reached the titanic sum of $2,000,000,000, the scope and the delicacy of Mr. Meyer's accomplished task become apparent.

* * * * * * *

His greatest achievement, though, has undoubtedly been his noiselessness as a vacuum cleaner of the Federal agricultural banking system over which he now presides. He has cleaned it in the midst of noiselessness instead of noisesomeness.

The Federal Farm Land Board smells perfectly sweet again now, and the Republican Party feels very grateful to Mr. Meyer.

Mr. President, if that is the truth as reported by this young man, it evidently was dictated to him by Meyer. If that is the truth, it is quite different from the report of our committee.

I have here a letter just received by me from a man whom I do not know at all. His name is Loehr. His letter is from Richmond, Va., December 27, 1928:

HONORABLE SIR:

* * * * * * *

I desire to state that I am a lifelong resident of this State and have been a citizen and taxpayer since reaching my majority and bear as good reputation and character as anyone.

I hope he does.

I am the holder for a trust fund of $5,000 in the joint stock land bank, First Carolinas, of Columbia, S. C., and have been greatly disappointed in finding the price of these bonds declining in value from par to 78.

That letter is signed by Charles E. Loehr, post-office box 211, Richmond, Va.

Mr. Meyer says here that these securities have not decreased in value—or this young man says so, who, I presume, got this dictation from Meyer. Here is a letter from one of the stockholders, just written, in which he says that his bonds have gone down from par to 78. I do not know whether Mr. Meyer or Mr. Hard, this newspaper correspondent, would call that an increase or a decrease. When I studied arithmetic I was taught that that was a decrease.

Now, listen to this report, gentlemen:

The books and records of this bank—

Speaking of the Columbia bank—were found to be complete and satisfactory and all information available.

Yet right now, and for months, there have been men in the bank down there making an examination.

The report says that Mr. Arnold, the president of the bank, was exonerated by the grand jury from wrongdoing; and yet they forced Arnold out of the bank on the 1st day of this month.

Mr. Meyer, in this interview, says that the other bank is all right; and yet Mr. Lever, former Congressman, has just recently resigned and gotten out; one man connected with it committed suicide because he was discovered to be a thief; another is in the penitentiary to-day serving a sentence. Yet the report of this committee came on the floor of the Senate before the election, of course. Meyer would not have dared give out this interview before the November election—not that it would have affected the election at all, but he was hiding; he was deceiving.

This report further goes on:

No official of the Columbia Intermediate Credit Bank has been implicated in the fraudulent transactions.

That is your committee report; and yet, as I have just stated, both of the presidents have had to get out, one of the cashiers committed suicide, and another is in the penitentiary.

Furthermore, the report says:

A special examination of the Columbia bank, its records, and accounts was instituted in August, 1926.

Less than two years—possibly 16 months—just before I introduced my resolution and offered this proof and filed it with the clerk of the Senate; and yet the report says that this examination—disclosed nothing which in any manner incriminated the officers of the Government bank.

The report also says that it is in good condition. Where is its good condition, Mr. President? What is its condition now? I want to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that somebody has not given the facts in this matter. I want to know whether it is Mr. Meyer, whether this committee was deceived, whether this committee deliberately reported to the Senate alleged facts that were not facts, or whether the young man who wrote this interview is the man. One of the three has certainly written what is not true.

I call your attention to Mr. Meyer's further statement there, or this young man's statement, that Mr. Meyer has cleaned up all the Federal banks. I have another resolution before the committee asking that the entire agricultural banking system be examined into. Last May, just before the Senate adjourned, there was not anything wrong with any of them according to Meyer. They were all in perfect condition, and had not done anything wrong. Now Meyer comes in here this morning, or this statement does, saying that he has got several of them in the penitentiary, several of them on the way to the penitentiary, and that he has driven out many officers from these banks. When did all this corruption go on? When did it start, Mr. President?

Another thing along the same line: I know personally that in these banks in Columbia—one headed by Mr. Arnold and one headed by Mr. Lever—not only have they turned out their president but they have turned out many of their bookkeepers. They are making changes all the time; and there is a young man from Columbia in this city right now in consultation with certain parties in reference to some changes that are to be made soon.

With these facts before the Senate, I do not expect any action; I am not asking any; but I simply call the attention of the world and of the Senate to the fact that this corruption and stealing has been going on for years, and that the Federal officers in charge of the banks knew it; and if the Senate had brought on this investigation when I begged them to do it millions of dollars would have been saved to this country and to the farmers of the country that have been stolen and put into the pockets of somebody else. Who got it? We know who lost it.

TURNING FARM WASTE INTO FARM PROFITS

Mr. SCHALL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to address the Senate for 15 or 20 minutes on turning farm waste into farm profits.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Senator from Minnesota will proceed.

Mr. SCHALL. Mr. President, before the holidays I introduced Senate bill 4834, which was referred to the Manufactures Committee, Chairman GEORGE P. MCLEAN, which, if enacted, will point the way to turn farm waste into farm profits, take up the slack in agriculture, and give tremendous impetus to farm production, put into the pockets of the farmer an extra billion and a half dollars, and reduce the cost of home building and newsprint paper. I also introduced Senate Joint Resolution 183, which was referred to the Committee on Printing, HENRIK SHIPSTEAD, chairman, to print the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on paper made from farm waste. This will give this particular industry a market of about $3,000,000.

The United States uses to-day about 60 per cent of the wood-pulp paper of the world. We import $275,000,000 worth of spruce-pulp paper every year, while cornstalks, straw, and sugar-cane pulp rot or are burned. Why not turn this $275,000,000 over to the distressed farmer instead of allowing it to go to the foreign Paper Trust? Why not save the newsprint paper buyers from twenty-five to thirty million dollars freight charges a year?

So many inquiries have been coming to me since the introduction of these bills that it seems to me a statement as to their purpose would be of interest at this time.

My bill, S. 4834, calls for an appropriation to build manufactories in different parts of the country where this raw material can be secured easily and demonstrate the commercial practicability of making a high-grade writing paper, newsprint paper, compo board, insulating board, and wall board from straw, cornstalks, and sugar-cane pulp, thus utilizing and turning into profit what is now waste and burnable nuisance. The Prairie Farmer, a national magazine, is printed on cornstalk paper. The Tipton (Ind.) Tribune has published two issues on cornstalk paper, Council Bluffs (Iowa) Nonpareil and the Logansport (Ind.) Press are about to publish editions on cornstalk paper.

I hold in my hand paper made from cornstalks. It is a page from the Danville (Ill.) Commercial News. It is as good paper as and better than is made to-day from wood pulp. In this particular paper, which was printed on December 16, a 100-sheet paper, there was published a letter written by the Secretary of Agriculture. I send it to the desk and ask to have it read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the letter will be read.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

I have your letter of November 19 and am very glad, indeed, to write you regarding my interest in the development of farm-waste utilization, especially in the utilization of cornstalks.

This department has been at work for many years on various methods of utilizing these waste products and has shown conclusively that cornstalks can be utilized not only for paper and building boards of various kinds but for various food products and other materials.

A recent survey made by this department, with a view to determining whether the spread between the cost of manufacture of these products from straw and cornstalks and the selling prices of the finished products would compare favorably with other sources of raw material, shows that it is within the range of practicability to accomplish this.

With the cooperation of this department and the Bureau of Standards practical tests are now in progress in the Middle West, especially at Ames, Iowa, which have for their object the cheapening of commercial processes of manufacture and the methods of gathering, baling, and storing the stalks. Doctor Woods, of this department, recently visited Ames and assures me that the progress made there indicates that the improved machinery being devised in the engineering department and the improved methods being worked out by Doctor Sweeney appear to have reached a practical stage and have already aroused much interest among manufacturing groups with a view to putting them into practical operation.

I will be very much interested in the issue of the Commercial News of Sunday, December 16.

There is no doubt that an enormous volume of available material now going to waste can be utilized. With the rapid progress that is being made in the technical and commercial procedures we feel sure that a new day is at hand when many of these agricultural wastes will become sources of profit, not only to the farmer but to the country at large.

I wish to commend your efforts to promote interest in this subject.

Yours very truly,

W. M. JARDINE, Secretary.

Mr. SCHALL. Last session Congress appropriated $50,000 for experimental purposes along this line. The story of the fight to get this little $50,000 appropriation would be of great interest and point a moral for reflection concerning our Department of Agriculture which exists for the benefit of the farmer. This $50,000 appropriation to the Department of Commerce was blocked through the efforts of the Department of Agriculture, who reported to the Bureau of the Budget that it was a duplication of their appropriation and it was only through the alertness and vision and belief in this line of development in the interest of the farmer of Herbert Hoover, then Secretary of Commerce, now President elect, that the appropriation was secured. After this appropriation had been blocked by the Department of Agriculture Herbert Hoover went to President Coolidge and had this appropriation revived by Executive order for use by the Bureau of Standards. Thus the farmer has our President and our future President to thank that the Department of Agriculture was not allowed to continue its unusual zeal in behalf of foreign wood pulp at the expense of our farmers. It will also be interesting to note that as much as a million dollars annually have been appropriated to the Department of Agriculture, at its request, for the development of paper pulp from other woods than spruce, while they now, through a pamphlet printed and sent out since this bill was introduced, openly admit that they have known for 20 years that straw, corn stalks, and sugar-cane pulp could be used to make paper. Why was this valuable discovery kept so quiet? Why not allow our devastated timberlands to revive while using the waste products of the farms, and permanently establish our paper supply within our own borders and outside the dictation of the foreign paper trust? And why is the Department of Agriculture in their recent pamphlet advocating that compo board be made of cornstalks, sugar-cane pulp, and straw when there is no importation of this article at all? Absolute control of newsprint paper is, in the end, control of our newspapers; perhaps it would be interesting to note the statement printed in Editor and Publisher a week or so ago that the Canadian paper trust have already put $16,000,000 into preferred stocks and bonds of well-established newspapers of our country and have another $100,000,000 and more to invest likewise providing they can secure contracts to furnish them their paper for the next 15 years. It is also curious to note that the paper manufacturers of Ontario and Quebec have secured the services of the premiers of Quebec and Ontario to officiate in these negotiations.

The country that controls the oil supply of the world will control the freedom of the seas, because oil is now the future propelling power of ships. The Dutch Shell Oil Co., in which the British Government is interested, now controls that oil supply and, I have heard it said, through affiliations and secret contacts is in control of 80 to 90 per cent of oil within our own borders.

The ship of the land to-day is the automobile. It needs oil. But it also needs rubber. We have no rubber, but Britain's far-sightedness has this article cornered. Oil, rubber, and public opinion are essential to the welfare of this Republic. And yet foreign propaganda has already split our naval replacement program in two and would now have us abandon it altogether.

From the meager appropriation of $50,000 great vistas of farm profits from waste have unfolded, due to the energy of W. E. Emley, of the Bureau of Standards, and Prof. O. F. Sweeney, of the Agricultural College, of Ames, Iowa, where $18,000 of the $50,000 has been spent. To the impoverished and despairing farmer the achievements of chemistry are beyond compare, make Ali Baba pale, and dim the rays of Aladdin's lamp, for through actual experiments cornstalks, straw, cotton stalks, and sugar-cane pulp can be turned into newsprint paper and sold for less than 2 cents per pound, about half the cost before this bill was introduced, and a long ways below the peak price of 6½ cents, and still leaving a wide margin of profit to the manufacturing plant and giving the farmer $12 per ton for cornstalks or cane pulp, $5 per ton for any kind of straw. This would give the farmer $12 an acre and up for his cornstalks, $15 an acre and up for his wheat, rice, or other straw. How many tons to the acre of sugar-cane pulp, I do not know, but I do know that it would at least run a ton. For the cotton and peanut farmer another chemical process has been practically demonstrated to turn peanut shells and hulls of cottonseed, over 2,000,000 tons of which are now annually burned, and oat hulls into a substance known as xylos. This is a sort of sugar which has no food value; is used now for explosive purposes, and sells at $100 per pound, and can be easily converted into automobile fuel, if produced in surplus quantities, or used to make rayon. The utilization of cotton hulls and peanut shells in producing xylos would soon convert this now burned waste into large profit for the southern farmer. Such a plant can be constructed for $50,000. Fruits of all kinds can by chemical process be turned into acids, and the culls, surplus, and rotted fruits that now stand as total loss can be put on the credit side of the ledger.

In my State to-day potatoes are a drug on the market. You can hardly get enough to pay for the sack in which they are shipped. Of course, we can remedy this situation somewhat by raising the duty on potatoes and thus keep out the Canadian potatoes that in the spring flood our market, and raising the duty on starch, and thus give the farmer the benefit of the present annual importation of over $3,000,000 worth of starch, but while we are waiting to raise the duty on farm products, which they sorely need, why not build a factory which will demonstrate the practicability of turning the potato into high-grade alcohol and net the farmer around $1 a bushel for his potatoes? Demand is steadily increasing for high-grade alcohol to be used in lacquers and paint known as Duco. It will take the place of banana oil, which we now import. We are shipping into this country to-day $10,000,000 of blackstrap, which is being made into alcohol. Why not divert this $10,000,000 into the pockets of the farmer, along with the $275,000,000 spruce pulp import and the over $3,000,000 starch import?

We appropriated last session $10,000,000 to eradicate the corn borer. This eradication consists of raking up the cornstalks and burning them at a cost of $3 an acre. Why not make it possible for the farmer to rake up these cornstalks and get $12 an acre for them instead of being in the hole $3? Why not eradicate poverty of the farmer along with the corn borer by appropriating the six and one-half million called for in my bill and locate in the region where the raw material is most convenient these manufacturing plants and demonstrate to private capital or farmers' cooperative associations these practical methods of turning farm waste to profit and give a tremendous impetus to agriculture; bring back the value of farm land, melt the frozen credits, take down the for-sale signs, lift the mortgages, stop the bank failures in agricultural districts, bring back the farmer boys to their homes from the overcrowded labor market of the cities, and eradicate the blight of despondency from the farmers' prospects, and remove the pending threat of foreign control of our newspapers? Why not put the farmer on an equal basis with the prosperous industries of the country which are to-day making their profits from former waste? The manufacturer has discovered that the profits of to-day are the waste of yesterday. The packers' profit to-day from former waste is more than they used to get from the main product, which gives rise to the proverb that they use and sell everything but the "squeal" of the critter.

The slag, the culm heap, the bone pile, and the chaff which the wind driveth away are the source of great and ever-greater income as the scientific minds of the world uncover the eternal verity that nothing is lost and nothing is waste.

When Congress shall have appropriated the money to work out the most economical method of production along this line paper and wall board and xylos manufacturing plants will spring up like magic in all the agricultural States, with the mother plant located somewhere in the State where shipping facilities, water, and so forth, are accessible. While throughout the State will be scattered the pulp-making plants, covering a radius of 30 or 40 miles, more or less, as the quantity of the raw material can be produced. These pulp-making plants can be erected for less than $100,000 and the farmer with his truck to-day thinks nothing of taking a load of a couple of tons or more over our ever-increasingly good roads to market 30 or 40 miles away.

The pulp thus produced can be dried in cakes, shipped or trucked to the mother plant, where with water again added it can be run through the rollers which are about 1,500 feet in length, and come out paper or wall board, for which the market is eagerly waiting, and the spruce pulp, which now goes into these commodities can then be held for far better prices for rayon, and reforestation will be given an impetus. The wood-pulp plants of to-day require tremendous crushing power consequent on coal, oil, or water power, while the chemical process requires no power and can, therefore, be set up anywhere, close to the raw material where water, shipping, or trucking facilities can be readily had.

Why pay freight from foreign countries on these commodities when they can be produced right at your home for far less than you are paying to-day? Why not use home product to print your papers, write your letters, build your houses?

In conclusion, let me say, Mr. President, that it seems to me that it is sure to come about that this process will be used. I will state just one reason that causes me to think so. The International Harvester Co., knowing that Herbert Hoover has been thinking along this line, knowing that he was back of this little appropriation of $50,000 to get something done for the farmer, have already set their engineers to work building a cheap, practical, home machine for cutting and binding and baling cornstalks and straw. They would not be doing that unless they thought something was coming along this line.

It is very encouraging to me because I know of the tremendous interests that are opposing the plan. It seems to me there is a time coming when we are going to be able to take the farm waste and turn it into a profit for the farmer, and when that is done I think the agricultural question will be well on its way toward settlement, when the farmer shall be put more nearly on an equality with the other industries of the country.

In the extra session which will be called for adjustment of the agricultural situation, we must raise the duty on farm products and also arrive at some plan whereby the surplus product of the farm can be lifted from the domestic market and thus give the farmer the actual benefit of whatever protection Congress sees fit to give him to equalize his industry with the other protected businesses and industries of the country. After five years of study on this surplus production problem it seems to me that the only sound and enduring basis for such an equalization is the plan known as the equalization fee which distributes the cost of lifting the surplus over the whole product, but while we are arguing over what is the best method of taking care of the surplus crop, let us get busy and appropriate the money called for in my bill and thereby demonstrate the commercial practicability of turning the farmer's waste into profit and add $15 and up an acre to the farmer, a part of whose crop is straw of any kind, $12 an acre and up to the corn grower, $12 an acre and up to the sugar-cane grower, $7 an acre and up to the peanut and cotton grower. In short, under this new chemical process, any vegetable such as the tops of sugar beets or other beets, carrots, or any vegetable or plant leaves can be baled and sold. Thus, nothing produced by the farmer would go to waste and all be credited on the right side as profit and herald a new era for agriculture.

These farm wastes are produced every year in the same locality, therefore assuring adequate material constantly for paper plants using field crops for the manufacture of their product and not a will-of-the-wisp supply, that is here to-day and some place else to-morrow.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have published in connection with my speech some articles written by Blair Coan, well-known author and newspaper correspondent in Washington, who has collected statistics and facts and put them into very comprehensible articles along this line, and also I ask permission to print several newspaper articles and editorials relating to the subject.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matters referred to are as follows:

[From the Kokomo Dispatch]

SCHALL'S NEW RESOLUTION

Senator THOMAS D. SCHALL, who is championing a fight in Congress for Federal backing to further the industrial utilization of cornstalks, rice and wheat straw, and other farm waste material, in the manufacture of newsprint paper, has come forward with a new resolution.

The proposition embodied in this latest resolution presented by Senator SCHALL, would provide for the printing of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on paper made from waste products of the field crops on American farms.

Here is a very practical method by which the Government can encourage the manufacture of paper from farm waste material, and assist to a degree in relieving the distress of the agricultural class. Large quantities of paper are purchased by the Government for the publication of the RECORD, and the suggested substitute would suffice very well. The Government could establish its own mills and use them as laboratories for perfecting processes of paper manufacture along this new line, thus stabilizing the business on an economic footing with competitive wood-pulp mills.

The Prairie Farmer, a national magazine of wide circulation, printed its December 15 issue on cornstalk paper, and proved the potential possibilities of this new product. Right here at home, the Tipton Tribune has published two issues on cornstalk paper. While the new print paper does not immediately measure up to the satisfactory standard of the wood-pulp product, it is remarkable that the first rolls have been so nearly perfect. The strength is even greater than that of ordinary newsprint, and the slight imperfections of the first output certainly can be easily eliminated by modern chemists. With the Government in charge of the experimentations, it is certain that the day will be speeded when farm waste material will be in demand, and when a new revenue will be flowing into agricultural channels to help in the restoration of rural prosperity. We should bear in mind that only a few years ago, American packers and millers had waste products which to-day are turned into the creation of new margins of profit.

[From the Tribune, December 17, 1928]

THE FARM BY-PRODUCTS PROBLEM

American meat packers have for many years been pointed out as outstanding practitioners of industrial thrift. For commercial purposes they developed the by-product business until it was virtually 100 per cent. That is to say, they found ways of making profitable use of the raw animal material that was once discarded as waste. They now use hair, blood, bone, membranes, offal to such economic purpose that by-product operations are now on about as impressive a scale as the packing business proper. The profits of the whole industry are essentially the by-products profits.

Under scientific research and discovery many other manufacturing industries have learned to utilize much that was once dealt with as waste. Progress in this direction has been of considerable worth to American industry in keeping it on a competitive footing with the industries of other countries where labor and other costs are smaller.

There has of late been a serious turning to the farm as a place where it is possible to make much of the by-products policy to the great economic advantage of agricultural producers. It has been found that a great deal of farm material now burned or otherwise disposed of as excess baggage may be made a source of farm income. Somebody who has made a study of the question estimates at $1,500,000,000 the amount that can be added annually to American agricultural income with commercial utilization of what is now farm waste.

Among the leading waste materials of the farm are straw and cornstalks, of which the aggregate is tremendous. From these can be made tar, illuminating gas, alcohol, oxalic acid, paper, strawboard, a silken fabric, and other commercial products. Corncobs, peanut shells, oat chaff, and surplus potatoes are other materials that yield themselves to this sort of scientific use.

The Federal Government has been asked to make liberal appropriations for demonstration plants at strategic points throughout the country to put the farm by-products business on a stable and paying basis, or at least to show by extensive experimentation what can be done toward that end. Whether Government aid to that extent is desirable or necessary is not a question to be answered offhand. We should first be well assured that private enterprise, benefiting and guided by the findings of Federal and private scientific research, can not be depended on to take up the work and carry it on to practical conclusions on a commercial basis. The object is a worthy one, since economic progress is largely a matter of economic thrift.

[From the Mitchell (S. Dak.) The Evening Republican]

WOULD BE AN EXCELLENT START

THOMAS SCHALL, the blind Senator from Minnesota, had an excellent idea the other day when he proposed that the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD be printed on paper made from the waste-crop products of the farms of America. The suggestion was advanced in a resolution offered by Senator SCHALL.

If it should come to pass that the resolution is adopted, it would be a tremendous impetus to the very infant industry of making paper from cornstalks. Mr. SCHALL did not estimate how much paper is used in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, but it must be an immense amount, and the Government bill for the printing of the RECORD is much more than that publication is worth.

However, if it were printed on the products of waste from the farms, the farmers wouldn't complain so much about the bill. We're for Senator SCHALL's suggestion all the way.

[From the Faribault (Minn.) News, Monday, December 17, 1928]

Senator SCHALL proposes that the Government shall try out the possibilities of utilizing waste farm products. He has introduced a bill calling for an appropriation of $6,550,000 from which to construct demonstrating plants in various parts of the country. According to the bill, two of these plants are to be built in Minnesota, one $1,000,000 plant for the manufacture of flax and wheat straw pulp and paper and a $500,000 plant for the manufacture of potato alcohol. This bill is a distinct effort in behalf of agriculture. The Government has spent larger sums upon less promising experiments. There seems to be good reasons why such a bill should be passed.

PAPER FROM CORNSTALKS

Yesterday morning cornstalks were taken to a Danville pulp mill. Six hours later the cornstalks appeared as newsprint paper in a special edition of the Danville Commercial News. It was good paper. That's important news for farmers, newspaper publishers, and those interested in forest preservation.

If cornstalks can produce cheap paper, trees will be safe.

[From the St. Cloud (Minn.) Journal-Press, Tuesday, December 18, 1928]

Senator THOMAS SCHALL, of Minnesota, has introduced a bill in the Senate whose purpose is to "transform agricultural wastes into profits for the American farmer," which is certainly commendable. * * * His idea is that the cost of making the demonstration can properly be met by the Government. As most of these demonstrations are for the making of paper the press of the country will naturally approve.

[From the Waterloo Tribune, Friday, December 28, 1928]

FOR USE OF FARM WASTES

Senator SCHALL, of Minnesota, is interesting himself deeply in use of farm wastes. He has a bill for the appropriation of some $7,000,000 for the building of experimental plants. He would build pulp mills, paper mills, for turning waste into useful products. After the experiment proved successful, his bill would direct the Government to sell the mills to private concerns.

Another bill directs the Government to print the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on paper made from cornstalks, rice, wheat, or flax straw.

Paper made from cornstalks has been used in printing a book describing the process. And this class of paper would be just as suitable for the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD as that now used. Senator SCHALL'S idea is not that the Government would consume a great deal of waste products in this one journal, but that the mills could get started by Government patronage and from that point develop.

The Government would be doing agriculture a service in this. It might extend the use of farm waste paper to all departments, as bulletins, envelopes—in fact, most of the printed matter sent out of Washington—could be served well by paper of this grade.

CORNSTALK PROFITS

If making paper from cornstalks develops into the large industry that the successful operation of a plant for that purpose at Danville, Ill., would seem to forecast, the farmers who produce the cornstalks are going to have to give the proposition of disposing of them some thought if they are to derive the profit from the new industry that they should.

An article in the Kansas City Star points out that the Danville industry sends out crews to husk the farmers' corn and gets the stalks for its service. The farmer has more leisure, but not more money. To make the industry profitable to the farmer, he should collect and bale his stalks as well as his straw and sell the bales to the industry. He would put in more time, but would have more money. The price should be sufficient to make the saving of the field waste a real incentive.

Certainly private experiment has shown enough to justify the Government in extending it. The Government has the facilities to reach definite conclusions. The cost is negligible compared to the value of this possible industry to the farmers, if it utilizes at a profit, a vast volume of crop material that now goes to waste. There is in this possibility a real aid to the farmers from sources not considered in general plans of farm relief.

Furthermore, if an important source of supply of pulp for paper and wall board and many other products now derived from other sources should be found on the farms, to that extent there would be a saving of the forests that now are cut far beyond processes of replacement for the making of wood pulp.

TO UTILIZE FARM WASTE

Senator SCHALL proposes that the Government shall try out the possibilities of utilizing waste farm products. He has introduced a bill calling for an appropriation of $6,550,000 from which to construct demonstrating plants in various parts of the country. According to the bill two of these plants are to be built in Minnesota, one $1,000,000 plant for the manufacture of flax and wheat straw pulp and paper and a $500,000 plant for the manufacture of potato alcohol. This bill is a distinct effort in behalf of agriculture. The Government has spent larger sums upon less promising experiments. There seems to be good reasons why such a bill should be passed.—(Faribault News.)

SCHALL PROPOSES PULP PLANTS IN MINNESOTA TO FEED WHEAT AND FLAX STRAW PAPER MILL—ST. CLOUD SUGGESTED AS LOCATION FOR PLANT; WOULD AID FARMERS AND RAILROADS

By Blair Coan, special Washington correspondent

WASHINGTON, D. C., December 27.—It was learned to-day that the $1,000,000 appropriation for a wheat and flax straw paper plant for Minnesota as outlined in Senator THOMAS D. SCHALL'S farm waste bill includes pulp plants to be located in various sections of the State, so that every farmer will have an opportunity to sell his present waste to those mills. Under Senator SCHALL'S program plants would be located at Duluth, Winona, Fergus Falls, Mankato, Rochester, and St. Cloud, with other locations to be selected later.

These plants would be for the purpose of reducing the straw to pulp and then the pulp would be shipped to the demonstrating mill, where it could be rolled into paper. It is authoritatively said that pulp plants could be started in practically every locality by the farmers, if they so wished, as their cost is very small, and in this way every community could reduce its waste to pulp and find market for it at the paper mill.

The railroad would benefit greatly by the added freight revenue, as at present these wastes are not transported. In a measure this project may assist the railroads of Minnesota, who complain they are hard pressed for freight revenue.

[From the Lincoln (Nebr.) Journal, Wednesday, December 19, 1928]

Senator SCHALL, of Minnesota, has introduced a bill which provides for the establishment of governmental experiment stations to study the problem of utilizing waste products of the farm. His idea is not that the Government should enter the business but that it should demonstrate the practicability of the manufacture of various products from cornstalks, wheat straw, and other waste materials. The plants which are now actually doing this thing on a commercial basis are the ones that hold hope for the farmer, but experimentation by the Government along this line might be of additional aid to agriculture.

[From the Litchfield (Minn.) Independent, Wednesday, December 19, 1928]

Senator TOM SCHALL has introduced a bill appropriating six and a half million dollars to erect demonstrating plants in Minnesota and other States for experiment manufacturing of paper and other fiber products from straw, flax straw, cornstalks, rice straw, sugar-cane refuse, and peanut shells, also a million dollars for a plant to be located in Minnesota to make alcohol from potatoes. No doubt much of these materials, now wasted, could be worked up into useful articles at a profit, but somebody has got to start the ball rolling.

WOULD SAVE FARM WASTE

A Senate bill, introduced by Mr. SCHALL, of Minnesota, aims at converting farm waste into salable commodities.

* * * * * * * *

Chief interest centers on the effort to manufacture paper pulp from ordinary farm products, but the entire bill affords a form of farm relief that would be permanent if successful. Favorable action on the Schall proposal would at least serve to try an experiment that may result in undreamed-of benefits.

WALTON LEAGUE WELCOMES USE OF CORNSTALKS—STATISTICIAN SHOWS THAT TON OF CORNSTALKS IN PAPER WILL SAVE 15 TREES

"Making paper from cornstalks is the basic conservation development of far-reaching benefits."

This significant statement comes from the Izaak Walton League of America in an article giving data on the forest situation with reference to the use of cornstalk paper received by W. T. Byland, president of the Danville chapter of the league.

The data was furnished by Seth Gordon, former director of conservation for the State of Pennsylvania, and with the national organization of the league for the past two years.

Mr. Gordon writes:

"Hundreds of thousands of tons of material which is now permitted to go to waste can be utilized to save a like amount of wood pulp made from forest trees. The Federal Government is also recommending that cornstalks be disked into the soil in order to curb the advance of the European corn borer. It appears that by chopping the cornstalks fine through the disking process the host of the borer is destroyed. If the cornstalks are utilized for the manufacture of paper a threefold purpose will be served—save the forest, utilize a waste material, and curb the ravages of a most destructive insect, in the curbing of which the United States Government is now spending $10,000,000 a year. Other destructive insects may likewise be destroyed by the same process.

"Pennsylvania was the home of America's first paper factory, established in Philadelphia in 1693. The paper in that mill was made from rags and was turned out in single sheets by hand. Paper for the press of Benjamin Franklin was made on Chester Creek, Delaware County, near Philadelphia. This mill produced paper by hand as late as 1866. During the American Revolution it supplied paper for the Continental currency.

"Franklin himself became interested in paper manufacture and is said to have started six different mills. When Washington and his associates met in Independence Hall to write the Constitution of the United States there were 48 paper mills in Philadelphia.

"Between 1850 and 1860 almost all newsprint was manufactured from straw. As the process of manufacture developed, plants were consolidated. In 1880, with the impetus given to the paper manufacturing industry upon the introduction of wood-pulp material, there were 50 paper mills in Pennsylvania alone, turning out products worth two and a quarter million dollars. In 1890 the number of such establishments had gone to 82, with an annual output of almost $5,000,000.

WOOD PULP CAME AFTER CIVIL WAR

"Paper from wood pulp was not made on a commercial scale in the United States until after the Civil War. Since the paper industry started in Pennsylvania, it is only natural that the process for making paper from wood pulp should have been developed in that State. In 1830 the first patent was issued to two Pennsylvania men, residents of Meadville, for making paper pulp from wood.

"The actual manufacture of paper from ground pulpwood fiber began in this country in 1867. The first experiments of pulpwood manufacture were made by Benjamin Tilhman, of Philadelphia. He began his experiments shortly after the close of the Civil War, but abandoned them just before bringing them to the point of commercial operation. His process was taken up in Sweden about 1870; the first American sulphite mill began operations in 1882. In 1870 there was but one establishment in Pennsylvania producing paper from wood.

"Paper mills were built in many other States, but many of them consolidated their operations. For example, there are now said to be only 12 pulp mills in Pennsylvania, but they consume 420,000 cords of pulpwood annually. The pulp mills of that one State require the annual wood crop of a half million acres of well-managed woodlands, a considerable part of which is imported from other States and even Canada.

"In 1850 the consumption of paper was 9 pounds per capita annually. In 1928 it is said the annual consumption of paper will be more than 200,000 pounds per person. We are now using more than 12,000,000 tons of paper annually, of which three and one-half million tons is newsprint, one and a half million tons magazine and book stock, and all other papers combined will total about 7,000,000 tons.

3,000 TONS PAPER IN 1810

"Publication of the first newspaper in America began in 1704. The output of paper in 1810 was estimated at 3,000 tons. By 1819 production had more than quadrupled. The Civil War, with its stimulus of news, increased the paper production of 1859 to 386,000 tons, in 1869, or a 10-year period, which marked the end of the period during which paper was made exclusively of other materials than wood.

"The soda process was the first of three chemical processes introduced. Chipped wood is cooked in a solution of sodium hydroxide. Under this process the short-fibered woods, such as aspen, yellow poplar, basswood, and the gums, are reduced. Soda pulp is used almost exclusively in book and the fine papers to give body.

"The mechanical process, sometimes called the ground-wood process, was introduced about the same time, but is based upon a different principle. It reduces such coniferous woods as spruces and true firs by abrasion against a rapidly revolving stone.

"The sulphite, which was the second chemical process to come into use, depends upon a cooking solution of bisulphate of lime and produces long-fibered pulp from such woods as the spruces, the firs, and the hemlock. This pulp is used to give the requisite strength to newsprint, books, and the fine papers. The sulphite process therefore is the most generally used of any of the wood-pulp processes.

"The third chemical process, the sulphate or Kraft process, is more recent and uses sodium hydroxide and sulphide in cooking, and from the hard pines, larches, etc., produces a very strong pulp, the standard use of which is for wrapping paper but which also is an important constituent of boards.

"Because of the nature of the solution ordinarily used, the soda and the sulphate processes are sometimes called the alkaline processes, and the sulphite is called the acid process.

"The United States now uses more paper than all other countries in the world combined. America originally had 822,000,000 acres of forest lands; now we have but 470,000,000 acres, of which 125,000,000 acres is original timber.

THREE TONS PRINT TO ACRE OF TREES

"Second-growth timber is represented by 250,000,000 acres, and 80,000,000 acres has been devastated through unwise lumbering and forest fires, until it is practically a barren waste. We import a large amount of pulp and pulpwood each year from Canada and several north European countries. Large amounts of paper manufactured complete are imported from Canada and several European countries. We cut more than four and one-half million cords of wood a year, but the total wood consumed in the United States and elsewhere to meet our paper requirements is approximately 10,000,000 cords of domestic and foreign wood.

"A cord of wood produces approximately 1,200 pounds of paper, or enough to supply the consumption, at the present rate, of six people. Statistics indicate that approximately 20 per cent of the present paper requirements in America are met by using waste paper and reprocessing it in such a way that it can be worked into various grades of paper and newsprint, but mostly paper board.

"Reducing the figures further, we find the United States pulpwood stands in the Northeast and in the Lake States runs about 5 cords per acre. On this basis the forest on 1 acre would make about 3 tons of newsprint, or 2½ tons of sulphite paper. By using 10 trees to a cord, as an average, 1 ton of newsprint paper requires about 15 trees, and 1 ton of all sulphide paper requires about 20 trees; whereas 1 ton of book paper, made up of new pulp and old paper combined, requires about 12 trees.

"The annual pulp requirements are approximately 2,400,000 acres. The American Pulp and Paper Association estimates that less than 1,000,000 acres of this requirement is supplied in the United States annually; the balance is imported in the form of pulpwood, pulp, or paper.

"If the cut of pulpwood is about 5 cords per acre, which reduced to paper amounts to 6,000 pounds, or 3 tons, and the average ton of paper used requires approximately 15 trees, it will be seen that every ton of cornstalk paper used will save 15 trees, or one-third of an acre of forest land. In view of the fact that America is cutting her timber five times as fast as it is being grown, this is very significant."

SCHALL EXPECTS FARM BACKING FOR BILL TO TEST STRAW PAPER MAKING

By Edgar Markham, Pioneer Press staff correspondent

WASHINGTON, December 12.—Support of farm organizations for his bill to establish a number of Government plants to demonstrate the utilization of waste products of agriculture is expected by Senator THOMAS D. SCHALL, of Minnesota. The bill has been referred to the Manufacturers Committee, and the Senator hopes to have public hearings shortly.

Five of the eight plants proposed by Senator SCHALL would be $1,000,000 factories to produce pulp and paper. Experiments with flax and wheat straw would be made in Minnesota. Rice straw in Arkansas, sugar cane in Louisiana, cornstalks in Indiana, and wheat straw in Kansas.

PLANT FOR SPUD ALCOHOL

For Minnesota, in addition, would be a $500,000 plant for the manufacture of potato alcohol. Location of the various plants would be left to the congressional delegations of the different States.

Senator SCHALL said he introduced his bill as a result of experiments recently made by W. E. Emley, chemist in the Bureau of Standards, with the use of wheat and flax straw, cornstalks, rice straw, beet sugar tops, cane pulp, and other straws for the manufacture of all kinds of paper, including print paper, compo board, wall board, and similar products.

For these experiments the last Congress appropriated $50,000, a part of which was expended on an experimental plant at Ames, Iowa. Senator SCHALL said the plan was to prove the commercial value of the products made from straw and cornstalks, and when placed on a paying basis, to turn the factory over to private operators.

NO POWER REQUIRED

By the use of the chemical process which Mr. Emley discovered white paper may be produced at a cost of 1½ cents a pound, Senator SCHALL explained. He added that no power was required to operate such a factory.

Wheat straw should bring about $15 an acre when sold to the proposed pulp factory and cornstalks about $12 an acre, it is thought. Senator SCHALL said an added benefit would be the elimination of the corn borer, for which Congress has appropriated millions, by reason of the removal of cornstalks from the fields.

One pulp factory can use the straw and cornstalks produced in 1,000 square miles of territory, Senator SCHALL asserted. * * *

CORN BORER SPURS USE OF CORNSTALKS—UNITED STATES BUREAU TURNS ATTENTION TO UTILITY OF BY-PRODUCTS—PAPER, MOTOR FUEL, ARTIFICIAL SILK AMONG DISCOVERIES

By George F. Authier, Tribune Washington correspondent

WASHINGTON, D. C., December 24.—The dreaded corn-borer pest, for the combatting of which Congress appropriated more than $10,000,000 in a single year, may prove a blessing in disguise if it continues to give impetus to the movement of the Bureau of Standards and the Department of Agriculture to utilize waste products of agriculture, particularly corn stalks and cotton stalks.

After an elaborate series of experiments, scientists of the Bureau of Standards have demonstrated that it is practicable to utilize corn stalks for the production of paper, artificial silk, pasteboard, building board, insulating board, and a score or more of valuable chemical by-products, including a motor fuel which it is predicted will eventually rival gasoline.

This important branch of research work was begun some years ago. It was given a new lease of life, however, by the sensational spread of the corn borer, and the wide publicity given throughout the country to the campaign of the Department of Commerce to educate farmers to the necessity of cleaning up and disposing of the cornstalks before midsummer of the following year.

RESULTS SATISFACTORY

The work of the Bureau of Standards has progressed far beyond the experimental stage. In conducting the most recent investigations, care has been taken to base the operations on a commercial scale, and the results have proved so satisfactory that a semicommercial plant is now being erected at Anniston, Ala., in cooperation with the Alabama State authorities, two State universities, and the Federal Phosphorus Co. to develop the technique of the new industry on a commercial scale. In the operations at Anniston, cotton stalks and cotton hulls will be the material most largely used, but it is to be noted that cornstalks may be used in the same manner.

As proof of what can be done with cornstalks it is to be noted that a recent edition of a Danville (Ill.) newspaper was printed entirely on paper made from such stalks. The paper, it is attested, compared favorably in color and quality with wood-pulp paper. The Bureau of Standards scientists have produced many examples of pasteboard, wall board, building board, and insulating material which compares favorably with the best examples of such materials made from wood pulp or cane. By subjecting the cornstalk pulp to extreme pressure a board is produced which is believed to have greater toughness and resisting qualities than wood boards of the same dimensions.

COST REDUCED

Practical experiments carried out at Ames, Iowa, Urbana, Ill., and Danville, Ill., have demonstrated, bureau experts assert, that the cost of collecting raw materials—cornstalks, cotton stalks, wheat straw, peanut shells, cottonseed bran, etc.—which hitherto has proved an obstacle, can be reduced to about $5 or $6 a ton. This figure, it is pointed out, is reasonable compared with the cost of wood pulp, since Canadian wood for pulp runs in the neighborhood of $10 to $12 a ton. Another important item is the fact that cornstalks are available in sections of the country which are far distant from the pulp-wood forests; and with mills located in the Corn Belt the transportation charges are materially reduced. It is to be remembered, too, that the cornstalk crop is annual, whereas a forest once cut over is not replenished immediately. At the same time the need for cleaning up cornstalks, as a check against the corn borer, ties in most handily with the new industry.

"In the Corn Belt or cotton-growing region," said a Bureau of Standards expert, "there is enough material within a radius of 10 or 15 miles to run a huge plant."

Where mills already have been established highly economic methods of collection have been instituted. Machinery especially adapted to the cutting and baling of the cornstalk has been devised, and the mills have organized a truck-collection service, which gets the baled material to the factory with a minimum of effort and expense.

ADVANTAGES CITED

There is slightly more waste in cornstalks or cotton stalks than in wood, the former running from 30 to 35 per cent fiber, and the wood from 40 to 45 per cent. However, this is offset by other considerations; and the fiber itself of the corn and cotton stalks is frequently more desirable because of its greater length, bureau experts assert.

That the importance of more recent development in this field is appreciated in authoritative circles is indicated by the fact that the Senator from Minnesota has introduced as a farm-relief measure a bill providing large appropriations for continuing work along these lines. The measure provides:

One million dollars for the study of flax and wheat straws in Minnesota.

Five hundred thousand dollars for the production of alcohol from potatoes in Minnesota.

One million dollars for the development of rice-straw paper and pulp in Arkansas.

One million dollars for the establishment of a sugar-cane paper and pulp plant in Louisiana.

One million dollars for a strawboard plant in the San Joaquin Valley, Calif.

Fifty thousand dollars for a plant utilizing peanut hulls, to be located near Albany, Ga.

One million dollars for a plant to convert wheat straw into paper pulp in Kansas.

MORE ECONOMICAL

The thing that makes the new processes worked out by the scientists of the Bureau of Standards so important is that they are more than twice as economical as any methods previously used. For years it has been the practice to cook wood with chemicals to obtain the fiber or cellulose for paper making. By this method all sugars and lignins were dissolved out and burned up in the process of recovering the chemicals.

Another method, practiced largely during the war, was to treat wood or sawdust with acids to recover sugars which were fermented in ethyl alcohol. By this method, however, the cellulose was destroyed. By the Bureau of Standards' method now in use, both the sugars and the cellulose are retained.

By a series of extractions and clarifications, a substance called xylose sugar is obtained from the wood, corn stalks, cotton stalks, peanut hulls, or whatever fibrous material is being used. This xylose is converted to a substance called xylotrihydroxy-glutaric acid, which is somewhat similar to citric or tartaric acids, and is used in the manufacture of soft drinks, for making cakes, ice cream, and in the dyeing industry.

Xylose also can be converted to "furfural," a liquid used for making molded plastic materials such as electric light fixtures, knife handles, taking the place of hard rubber or bakelite.

MOTOR FUEL MADE

Xylose may also be fermented into alcohol and acetone, which forms a most efficient motor fuel. Bureau chemists are convinced there is enough industrial waste in the country to supply the automobiles in the United States with fuel. So far, the production of this fuel has been carried out only on a laboratory scale, but studies made of its commercial possibilities are said to have proved extremely encouraging.

Besides the xylose sugar, agricultural wastes yield certain gums which are useful as binding material in the manufacture of coal briquets, as adhesives for the making of paper boxes, or the cementing of inside building material.

Besides converting the cellulose residue into cheaper forms of cellulose useful for the manufacture of papers, Bureau of Standards' chemists have also changed it into very valuable alpha cellulose suitable for making nitrocellulose and cellulose acetate, which is used in the manufacture of lacquers, varnishes, and artificial silk. It is also used in the manufacture of solid materials, such as celluloid.

Xylose may be converted into an antifreeze compound which is said to have many advantages, both of economy and utility, over other antifreeze compounds. The increasing demand for a substance of this kind makes the manufacture of the antifreeze compound almost an industry in itself, scientists assert.

COMMERCIAL-NEWS USES CORNSTALKS FOR EDITION OF PROGRESS—WORLD'S FIRST NEWSPAPER UTILIZING FARM WASTE FROM FIELDS OF VERMILION COUNTY INAUGURATES INDUSTRIAL ERA OF INTERNATIONAL IMPORTANCE

By Jack M. Williams

The Commercial-News presents to the world to-day the first daily newspaper printed on cornstalks.

And incidentally—because Danville is the cradle of a development attracting world-wide attention—this newspaper takes advantage of the opportunity to present the story of its community along with that of the cornstalk pulp and paper industry which has been born in its midst.

The paper you hold in your hand heralds more eloquently than printed or spoken words an accomplishment which the outside world recognizes to be of national and international importance.

This practical demonstration tells convincingly to a world hungry for new sources of paper-making material and new supplies of cellulose for industries which affect all people's daily lives that science has at last found a way to supply those needs from waste products of agriculture.

What reader is so lacking in imagination that he can not hear the rustle of the corn fields as he turns these pages?

Who can not visualize as he reads these printed columns that the successful establishment of a pulp and paper industry using agricultural wastes as its raw material means—

The stopping of overdrafts on the world's forest resources.

Automatic flood control by arresting the destruction of forests at the headwaters of streams.

Creation of new sources of income for agriculture from by-products now wasted.

Building of pulp and paper mills where they have never been built before—wherever corn is grown abundantly and there is ample water supply for manufacturing.

Gradual return of part of the American paper industry from Canada and its eventual establishment near the center of population and industry—the Corn Belt of the Middle West.

This newspaper is the answer to skeptics who said, "It can't be done."

It has been done!

The making of paper from cornstalks, high-grade and low-grade paper—paper showing qualities that surprise experts and even those who sponsored its development—is now on a commercial scale. Cornstalk pulp is being shipped in carload quantities from the world's first commercial cornstalk pulp mill in Danville.

MANY USES FOR CORNSTALK PULP

The paper in the black-and-white sections of this edition was manufactured in the plant of the Kalamazoo Vegetable Parchment Co. in Kalamazoo, Mich., from pulp produced by the Cornstalk Products Co. of Danville.

The first commercial run of 58,000 pounds was witnessed by paper experts, who up to the last moment were skeptical of the results. Slowly, cautiously at first, and then at increasing speeds until 500 feet per minute were coming over the rolls 13 feet 3 inches wide—enough paper to cover an acre in 7 minutes—this first cornstalk newsprint was produced. It was run finally at the top speed of the most modern paper machine in the world, a new installation costing $750,000.

Since this first sheet was produced on October 19, 1928—mark the date for it will be historic—cornstalk paper has been waxed for fine water-proof paper, coated by the Michigan Paper Co. in 65-pound and 80-pound weights for fine illustrations, and made in "antique" finish as high-grade book stock for the world's first book on cornstalk paper, calendared for retogravure printing and produced in white and yellow tinted bond for letterheads and envelopes.

Some of the characteristics of cornstalk paper are its toughness and smoothness. The fiber is fine and short, so short that paper-making experts did not believe it would be a satisfactory paper-making material.

Several paper manufacturers have experimented with cornstalks in a desultory way without attaining anything commercially practicable. It remained for an organization composed of men almost entirely outside the pulp and paper world to conquer the supposedly insurmountable difficulties of developing a practical paper-making pulp from cornstalks. The story of how this has been accomplished, the difficulties encountered, the obstacles overcome, is one of the industrial and scientific romances of our time.

In printing the edition of progress on cornstalk paper, the Commercial-News does not intend to imply that newspapers for the immediate future are likely to be printed on cornstalk paper.

Naturally the first output will go into papers costing more than newsprint, but this edition shows what can be and has been done.

Sponsors of the cornstalk-pulp development do not expect to revolutionize the paper industry or to bring about a great industrial migration overnight.

EXPERT CLAIMS CORNSTALK HAS LOW FERTILITY

Dr. George M. Rommel, official investigator farm waste utilization for Secretary of Agriculture Jardine, believes that any company that offers the farmer an opportunity to get rid of his cornstalks is doing that farmer a service.

* * * * * * *

In an article in Successful Farming Doctor Rommel summed up the latest available scientific information on cornstalks as fertilizer.

"All the statements on this point," says Doctor Rommel, "have been based on straight chemical analyses of nitrogen, potassium, and phosphorus contained in cornstalks. The prevailing local values of these chemical constituents, as shown by fertilizer prices in the neighborhood of the man who made the analyses, were taken to estimate the money value of the fertilizing constituents removed from the soil in a ton or an acre of harvested cornstalks.

"The trouble with this method is that no attention was paid to the availability of the fertilizing constituents, and this throws the assumed values out of line, especially in the case of nitrogen. This is not the fault of the men who originally made these estimates; blame it on the progress of knowledge.

"It is now known that the bacteria which decomposes cellulose, which makes up 35 to 40 per cent of the weight of cornstalks, do not act in the absence of nitrogen. Therefore cornstalks will decompose only if nitrogen is added to them, or, if they are plowed under, at the expense of nitrogen already in the soil. In the light of this fact, there are reliable chemists who will risk an estimate of no more than 75 cents as the value of the nitrogen in a ton of cornstalks.

"It is obviously ridiculous to argue about the fertility value of cornstalks with a man who rakes them up and burns them every spring, or for such a man to contend that they are worth $3 to $5 or some other figure a ton when he would burn them anyway. Likewise are both sides to the debate off the track when the corn borer is right around the corner and the old stalks must be disposed of before the next crop is planted."

"HORSE" SENSE IN MAKING NEWSPRINT—WASHINGTON CORRESPONDENT URGES USE OF FARM WASTES IN THE MANUFACTURE OF PAPER

By Blair Coan

(Copyright 1929)

WASHINGTON, D. C., January 3.—This is a narrative about "horse" sense and farm aid. They should go together, but they don't. If they did this would not be a news story.

For about 40 years, aided and abetted by the Department of Agriculture and all other departments which might aid or abet, we have been cutting down our forests to make print paper. The fact that material capable of making all this paper has and does rot on American farms, causing about a billion dollars loss to the farmer annually, is not the subject of this chronicle—it is the pitiful object.

Our highly trained scientists not only indorsed this denuding of our woodlands, but now that spruce is about extinct are suggesting we chop down all other standing timber and make paper of it. I am neither trying to qualify as a scientist or as a farmer. The only science I know is not to trump my partner's ace and as for farming, I don't know peanuts from potatoes until they reach the grocery store. But I maintain, falling back on "horse" sense as authority, that these trees serve a useful purpose as they are and as long as we can make paper without them why make it with them?

About 30 years ago Kansas was our well-known cyclone State. When you went there to visit the first question you asked was: "Where is the cyclone cellar?" and every time you saw a cloud in the sky you measured the distance between where you were and it. But they had a little "horse" sense in Kansas, and about that time the farmer began planting trees as windbreaks. The Kansas that was, 30 years ago, barren of trees is now almost a woodland. And who for the past 10 years has read of a Kansas cyclone? Then Kansas was dotted with cyclone cellars, to-day they are a curiosity.

In Indiana and Illinois cutting and not much planting of trees has been carried on for 30 years and in the past 10 years the whirlwinds which made Kansas famous have been transferred to these two States.

The Mississippi River has been overflowing its banks each spring ever since it had banks, but each year the volume of water and the flood damage increases. This is because when there were plenty of trees in the upper basin States the roots held the water in the ground and allowed it to run off slowly. Now there are fewer roots to hold it and the water runs directly through the ground into the rivers. Each year these floods are sure to increase, just as they did, and are still doing, in China, after all the trees were cut down and despite all engineering science.

We may scientifically dam the Mississippi with a billion-dollar appropriation but "horse" sense tells us that if we would make our paper from waste field crops and allow the trees to stand and keep on planting them, we would accomplish more.

There are many other things that trees do for men. They affect climate. They cause the rain, so necessary for growing crops. But above all, why spend millions each year devising means of making all kinds of trees into paper when these waste farm materials have the same relative value in paper, but no other worth to the human race?

So if we cut down all the trees and allow the farm wastes to rot there will not be such a large demand for paper, because there will not be so many people left to demand it. This may prove up with science, but it doesn't sound like "horse" sense to me.

OF IMPORTANCE HERE

News of the possibility of construction of a million-dollar Government plant for the manufacture of by-products from sugar-cane stalks is of enormous importance to Baton Rouge and to the State.

Provision for such a plant is included in the Schall bill just introduced into Congress.

* * * * * * *

The idea embodied in the Schall bill is a highly important one from an economical standpoint. Any utilization that can be made of agricultural products going to waste represents a forward step that may lead to far-reaching results. Bagasse, or that portion of the sugar cane which remains after it has been crushed in the mill, is already utilized to some extent in the manufacture of celotex, a fiber wall board. Limited experimentation has been conducted in making paper from bagasse.

and while complete success in this phase project has not yet been achieved it is possible that further and more complete experimentation will yield more satisfactory results. Cornstalks are already bringing good market prices, and it is claimed that bagasse likewise can be advantageously utilized.

This is an age when the manufacture of by-products has reached enormous proportions and must be counted as an important factor in the economic world. The greater utilization of bagasse would not only mean larger return for the sugar planters, but would also represent an important contribution to the industrial world and to the scheme of living.

It is welcome news to know that such a project is receiving attention, and as something of tremendous importance to Louisiana and to Baton Rouge there should be cooperation of forces in promoting the establishment of an experimental plant here.

PROCESS OF MAKING PRINT PAPER FROM CORNSTALKS SUPPRESSED FOR 20 YEARS

By Blair Coan

(Copyright 1928)

About 20 years ago a chemist working in the Department of Agriculture discovered that white paper could be produced cheaper and better by using the cellulose of field crops than by the conversion of spruce wood. He reported his discovery to the then Secretary of Agriculture, and the fact was heralded to the world. This was all that happened. No effort was made to test the commercial value or costs of making paper from corn stalks, wheat, flax, or rice straw or sugar-cane pulp. With the discovery all work in that direction was abandoned.

NEW BUREAU ESTABLISHED

Meanwhile the lumber and paper interests sent their representatives to the Department of Agriculture to explain that spruce wood might soon be exhausted and that an effort should be made to develop a process through which paper could be manufactured from other woods. If the Department of Agriculture suggested to them that field crops could be utilized when the spruce was all consumed, there is no record of it. But there is a record of what this department did do. It set about establishing at Madison, Wis., what they were pleased to call a bureau of forest products. This organization was and is for the purpose of discovering some method to use other woods for paper making.

Just how much has been expended by the Department of Agriculture in this forestry bureau is not known. The cost is in the millions yearly, and it is certain that already more money has been expended on this bureau than it would cost to erect enough pulp plants to reduce all field crop wastes to paper pulp, thereby increasing the present income of the American farmer by more than $1,000,000,000 annually.

Mr. Hoover secured the passage by Congress of a bill authorizing $50,000 for experiment on farm wastes.

Immediately on the passage of this bill the Department of Agriculture attacked the appropriation on the ground that it was duplicating a work they were engaged in, and with this argument convinced the Director of the Budget that the amount should be stricken out. This was done, but the fact was discovered before it was too late. The item was put back by Executive order, and with this money all these discoveries, including the commercial process of making xylos from cotton-seed bran and peanut shells, which may raise the monetary yield to cotton and peanut planters about $7 an acre, were made.

Whether coincidently or by design, it can not be said, but about this time the lumber interests opened a Washington office and subscribed $5,000,000 to be spent in advertising. The Bureau of Standards continued its work and this summer announced its marvelous discoveries. But the announcement fell on deaf ears. No newspaper correspondent at Washington decided it was worthy of notice, and so, until this paper began publishing the facts as written by your correspondent, the merit of this work was unknown.

BILL INTRODUCED BY SCHALL

Senator THOMAS D. SCHALL, of Minnesota, who realized what these findings would mean to the farmers of his State as well as to the entire agricultural belt, introduced a bill asking for $6,550,000 for Government demonstration plants to prove the commercial value of the work of the Bureau of Standards. Under ordinary circumstances this was what an editor in the agricultural West might consider a good news story, but the Washington correspondents decreed otherwise, and it was not until the papers had received the information by mail that the news services reluctantly sent out a detailed story. However, since that time the entire country has heard of these revelations. Scores of Congressmen and many Senators have either called on Senator SCHALL or your correspondent for information on this subject, and it would appear that those legislators who attempt to thwart the making of profits from farm wastes will have to deal with an electorate whose irritated patience is more than they can endure.

Meanwhile the Department of Agriculture is advising that persons who are interested in the development of farm wastes should direct their attention to the making of strawboard and not white paper. As we import about $275,000,000 worth of paper annually and no strawboard, it is difficult to guess the reason for this suggestion.

But one thing is certain, despite the Department of Agriculture, the lumber and paper industry, the combination of Washington newspaper correspondents to suppress this news, and every other agency, eventually paper will be made from field crops and the farmers will indeed reap a harvest.

This article is lese majeste, of this there is no doubt, and to the charge I plead guilty; but its publication may set aright a wrong which should not be perpetrated.

WASHINGTON, D. C., January —.—By the passage of Senator SCHALL'S farm waste bill Congress can within five years increase the present income of the American farmer by more than a billion dollars annually. You may think this is an extravagant statement, but the greatest economists of this country are agreed that it is a positive fact.

This new agricultural profit has been made possible by chemistry. The source of this revenue is to be derived from cornstalks, sugar-cane pulp, cottonseed bran, peanut shells, rice and wheat, straw and potatoes, all of which in many sections are now almost waste products.

The discovery of these facts was made by the Bureau of Standards on a cash outlay of $50,000 which the last Congress reluctantly bestowed on that Government bureau. A continuation of this work by allowing the Bureau of Standards to build the necessary plants to demonstrate the commercial value of the newly found products is all that is necessary.

Briefly, cornstalks make better and cheaper newsprint paper than is now produced by spruce pulp. Sugar-cane pulp, another waste product, makes the highest grades of writing paper at much less its present cost. Cottonseed bran and peanut shells, of which 2,000,000 tons are now produced and burned yearly, have been found to contain 45 per cent of xylose, a sugar of no food value which will take the place of glucose in the spinning of rayon, will produce high-power explosives and a number of other necessary commodities. Xylose now sells for $100 a pound. Straw makes the best wall board or synthetic lumber; all we have is now produced from sugar-cane pulp and supplies only 1 per cent of the potential demand. Straw also makes high-grade paper pulp. Potatoes will produce the higher as well as the lower grades of alcohol, which at present to manufacture we import annually from foreign countries $10,000,000 worth of blackstrap molasses.

By allowing these plants to operate Congress will give the corn grower approximately $12 per acre more for his product, the sugar-cane grower the same amount, and add about $7 an acre to the income of the cotton and peanut planter. The wheat farmer and rice grower can increase their monetary yield about $15 an acre, while the potato grower will in reality make his product—a drug on the market—in the form of alcohol.

None of these statements are guesses, suppositions, or a desire to please the agricultural sections of the country. They are cold, hard facts, as will be related in this paper in following articles, which will show in detail what has been done in these particular fields by the Bureau of Standards and what can now be done to secure this money for the farmer.

[This is the second of a series of articles suggesting that the Bureau of Standards be permitted to add an almost unbelievable revenue to the income of the American farmer resulting from experiments just completed at Washington, D. C., This survey is being made by the special Washington correspondent]

By Blair Coan

(Copyright 1928)

WASHINGTON, D. C., January —.—The farmer is a manufacturer. He takes seed, mixes it with the chemicals of the soil and the air and produces food. The corn farmer manufactures a product of which he sells, by weight, 40 per cent of the article produced and then throws the other 60 per cent away. Do that with steel rails or any other commodity and see how long you will stay in business. What the farmer now throws away is in reality his profit.

Partly the farmer must blame himself, because the Bureau of Standards at Washington has been functioning efficiently for a number of years and he has not asked help to determine how his waste product could be utilized; but now that white paper can be made better and cheaper from this waste, if he does not see that the plan is worked out commercially, he will have only himself to censure.

The Bureau of Standards has completed a process by which $12 a ton may be paid for cornstalks delivered at the pulp mill, and these pulp mills should be located every 30 miles in corn-growing States. If the coming session of Congress will allow this bureau the necessary money to build a pulp mill, the commercial value will be established, and from then on it is up to the farmer to see that mills are erected, so the paper manufacturers can secure pulp without importing it from Canada.

Investigation by the Bureau of Standards shows that a cornstalk will produce from 35 to 45 per cent by weight of paper pulp. By paying the farmer $12 a ton for cornstalks delivered at the pulp mill, and after a cost of $18 a ton for processing, the pulp will bring $100 a ton and successfully compete with spruce pulp, which is higher in price and which in quantity is decreasing so rapidly that it soon will be so expensive as to make its use for newsprint paper almost prohibitive.

Furthermore, spruce pulp, which is known commercially as alpha cellulose, is becoming too valuable to be used in the manufacture of white paper. It is now used as the base of gunpowder and paint and is worth more per ton for this use. For this reason paper manufacturers who own standing spruce refuse to cut it for paper pulp, preferring to buy their pulp in Canada, thereby saving their trees to be sold for higher prices to the paint and powder industries. The average acre of corn produces a ton of cornstalks and is harvested from November to March, at a time when the farmer has no other crop.

To be of commercial value, according to the bureau, a pulp mill must have a yearly capacity of 50,000 tons of cornstalks, and this supply must come from within a radius of 15 miles. Therefore, from a territory comprising 90 square miles, or 576,000 acres, such a plant, according to Government figures, will pay the farmer and the processing and yield the owner a net of about $1,400,000 annually.

As in all matters of progress, there is some opposition to this farm aid by the "old school" of paper manufacturers who do not want to use the new pulp, not that it is not as good as spruce pulp, for the Government says it is better, but because it is new.

[This is the third of a series of articles suggesting that the Bureau of Standards be permitted to add an almost unbelievable revenue to the income of the American farmer resulting from experiments just completed at Washington. This survey is being made by the special Washington correspondent]

WASHINGTON, D. C., January —.—Opposition at this session of Congress, if any considerable amount develops, to the manufacturing of white paper from cornstalks, the programs which will put $150,000,000 more into the pocket of the American farmer, will come in the main from the foreign countries where we are now expending more than $240,000,000 annually in the purchase of white paper and wood pulp.

The United States uses yearly more than 56 per cent of the paper production of the world. About $90,000,000 is sent to Canada by our paper manufacturers to purchase wood pulp and more than $147,000,000 is paid to Canada and European countries for manufactured paper. Of the latter amounted purchased, $131,500,000 is for newsprint paper.

There is one cornstalk pulp plant now operating in the United States; it is located at Danville, Ill., and three weeks ago it shipped its first carload of pulp to a paper mill for manufacture. This plant is operating with a patent developed by a Hungarian and has had many difficulties. The Bureau of Standards, however, declares it has a process which is much more profitable than the one in the use there. The plant at Danville at first attempted to make alpha cellulose for the manufacture of rayon, but failed in this on account of its inability to get the "shiners" or spots out of the finished pulp, so that it has now turned its attention to making newsprint pulp and with which it has been successful.

To supply the amount of paper pulp now imported to this country will require at least 50 plants having a capacity of 50,000 tons of stalks, or 20,000 tons of pulp annually, and to produce the pulp necessary for our import of newsprint paper will require at least 50 more, so that at least 100 of these plants situated in corn States will be necessary to supply our immediate demand. Atop of this, many more pulp mills will be necessary to care for our yearly increasing demand for paper, as well as for those paper manufacturers now cutting their standing spruce for paper pulp who will soon be ready to sell it as alpha cellulose at a greater profit than they are now receiving for it as manufactured white paper.

When Congress acts in this matter the corn grower will add $12 an acre to his yearly income.

WASHINGTON, D. C., January —.—There is no longer any reason to feed the surplus apple crop to the hogs if Congress will permit the Bureau of Standards to build a plant to extract the malic acid from the surplus of this crop.

This discovery, as well as the making of paper from cornstalks, rice straw, and sugar-cane pulp, wall board from straw, xylos from cottonseed bran and peanut shells, and alcohol from potatoes, is directly traceable to the work of W. E. Emley, chief of the division of organic and fibrous materials of the Bureau of Standards.

In discussing these matters to-day Mr. Emley said:

"There is not a waste product of the farm, be it ever so little, which can not be used to financial advantage by the farmer. I hope to take up the waste in small crops just as soon as the big crop projects we are now engaged in are completed.

"Already in California there is a small plant making citric acid from the culled lemons. The same thing can be done with every other fruit crop; that is, extract the acids from fruits which can not be sold.

"Tops of plants which are now thrown away as worthless are almost 60 per cent cellulose, and when pulp mills are operating may be sent there and sold at a price perhaps as high as that part of the plant now raised for market.

"When these agricultured developments are put into operation farming will be one of the most profitable of vocations."

The next article will deal with where many of the cornstalk plants should be located.

WASHINGTON, D. C., January —.—While as yet there is no official data on the subject, it may be roughly said that about 200 or more pulp plants to make cellulose for paper manufacture will be necessary to supply the need of this country and to make our paper industry self-sustaining. These plants may be located in every section of the country, but principally in the Middle West and Southern States.

There has been no definite work done on this detail except in a general way, but it is possible to say they should probably be located in the following States: New York, Pennsylvania, Maryland, Ohio, West Virginia, Kentucky, Indiana, Illinois, Michigan, Iowa, Missouri, Nebraska, Wisconsin, Texas, Oklahoma, Mississippi, Arkansas, South Carolina, Minnesota, Louisiana, and Kansas.

Those States producing the greatest amount of corn, rice, wheat and flax straw, and sugar-cane will, of course, be chosen for the greatest number of pulp plants. The erection of these plants has another bright side for farming and that is the fact that ultimately all waste materials of every description down to foliage from trees can be reduced to cellulose in them, so the farmer can bale not only his cornstalks but eventually even the waste beet tops and sell them to the mill for $12 a ton.

Cornstalk mills, the Bureau of Standards is inclined to believe, should be built by cooperative farmers' organizations, as a constant supply of cornstalks is necessary to their successful operation, and unless the farmers themselves are interested in the project there is danger of failure through inability to secure the adequate supply of raw material needed. This fact gives the farmer an opportunity to invest in a profitable manufacturing enterprise along with increasing the value of his farm products.

In Senator SCHALL'S bill $1,000,000 is asked for a cornstalk mill for Indiana.

WASHINGTON, D. C., January —.—Corn growers within 10 miles of Ames, Iowa, are now receiving $12 an acre for their cornstalks from an insulating-board plant being operated there by the Bureau of Standards in conjunction with the Iowa State College. Another plant for this purpose has just been completed at Dubuque, Iowa, and is known as the Maizewood plant, so that this winter the corn farmers in that section will be receiving a similar price for their corn-land waste.

The Ames plant was constructed by the Bureau of Standards with $18,000 of the $50,000 gingerly appropriated by our economical Congress, which thinks nothing of spending a million dollars to investigate "bees' knees," or some other highly potential commodity, together with what money Iowa State College could afford to subscribe. It was a difficult undertaking on a shortage of funds, but was finally completed and is now manufacturing as good an insulating board as there is on the market, and successfully competing with similar boards which are produced from sugar-cane pulp.

A difficulty at Ames was encountered in providing the necessary harvesting equipment for the farmer, but this has now been done successfully. At Danville, Ill., the farmers use their own balers for this purpose, and with success.

Speaking of the attitude of Congress toward this the greatest economic move in our time, Prof. O. R. Sweeney, the chemical engineer of the Iowa State College, said yesterday:

"It seems to me that the Federal Government should spend large sums of money in developing this sort of thing. If we can afford a huge laboratory at Madison to study forest products and support it with some millions of dollars each year we can do as much for the vast quantity of agricultural waste material, which is estimated to reach almost a billion tons a year."

WASHINGTON, D. C., January —.—Complete eradication of the corn borer, that deadly parasite which the corn farmer fears most, is certain the moment the corn producer harvests and sells his cornstalks for paper. This worm which destroys the crop comes to life only when cornstalks are allowed to lie in the field, and for this reason the farmer is now compelled to rake these stalks into piles and burn them to guard against this destructive animal.

The cost to the farmer of gathering these stalks and burning them is $3 an acre. Not only can he save this amount of money but he can secure $12 an acre for the waste product he now burns when Congress is induced to act for his benefit.

Having already legislated backwards, Congress is now going to be asked to move forward. Last session our able legislature authorized $10,000,000 to eradicate the borer. This amount of money would construct 10 paper and pulp plants, utilizing the cornstalks from 500,000 acres of land, thereby preventing any invasion by the borer and paying the farmer $13,000,000 for cornstalks and the paper manufacturers many millions more.

One of the most reasonable arguments for locating these pulp and paper plants in corn, rice straw, and sugar cane sections is the fact that, at present, all the paper mills are located along the Canadian border where the spruce is available, with the result that newsprint purchasers have to pay, in some cases, as much for freight as they do for their paper. By building these plants where these products are grown, the buyers of paper in all localities can secure their product at the least possible freight cost. For the above reason, this, of course, can not be done while spruce wood is used for pulp. Newspaper buyers of paper are now paying from $20,000,000 to $25,000,000 annual freight charges, which could be saved. Furthermore, in this connection, every year as the spruce is cut the location of the timber moves farther away from the paper mills and continues to add more and more to the freight cost.

In the use of field crops the product will not move away from the mills, as it is produced yearly on the same land.

[This is the eighth of a series of articles suggesting that the Bureau of Standards be permitted to add an almost unbelievable revenue to the income of the American farmer resulting from experiments just completed at Washington. This survey is being made by the special Washington correspondent]

WASHINGTON, D. C., January —.—This week Mr. W. E. Emley, of the Bureau of Standards, chief of the division of organic and fibrous materials, completed his experiments in the use of rice straw for the manufacture of high-grade white paper. The test was a complete success. White paper of the highest quality, which we import to the extent of more than $25,000,000 yearly and the demand for which is increasing so rapidly, the ability to produce enough for our consumption is becoming questionable, can be manufactured from rice straw.

This straw, which is now absolute waste, may be sold to a paper mill at $5 a ton. The average yield to the acre is 3 tons, so that the rice grower will receive an increase of $15 an acre for his product as soon as Congress acts.

The evolution of paper production is again in progress, according to the Bureau of Standards. Seventy-five years ago all paper was made from rags. Slowly this was changed by the introduction of wood pulp, until to-day less than one-hundredth of 1 per cent of the paper used comes from this source and now field crops are going to take the place of wood pulp.

The field-crop pulp may be produced at only a fraction of the present wood-pulp cost, because no gigantic grinding machines nor tremendous horsepower to operate them are essential. Cornstalk, straw, rice, and sugar-cane are reduced to pulp by acids instead of by machines. It is the necessity of that enormous power which is another cause for the paper mills being located along the Canadian border, where water power may be secured to turn these huge wood grinders.

When field crops are used for the manufacture of paper these plants can be located in practically every State, not only utilizing the waste farm crops but also reducing freight costs to the consumer. Senator SCHALL'S bill includes $1,000,000 for a rice-straw plant to be located in Arkansas.

[This is the ninth of a series of articles suggesting that the Bureau of Standards be permitted to add an almost unbelievable revenue to the income of the American farmer resulting from experiments just completed at Washington. This survey is being made by the special Washington correspondent]

WASHINGTON, D. C., January —.—Manufacturing wall board from sugar-cane pulp has been a big industry in this country for more than 10 years. The largest wall-board plant in the country is located at New Orleans, and although it is of great capacity it is able to furnish but 1 per cent of the potential demand for synthetic lumber.

But sugar-cane pulp is so high in cellulose that there is a demand for a paper-pulp mill from the southern planters. Of the $50,000 which Congress so "generously" gave to the Bureau of Standards, there is remaining $15,000, and W. E. Emley, the bureau's chemical engineer, will have to decide whether this is to be used for a cornstalk or a sugar-cane pulp mill. The country at this time can not have both, because Congress in "its wisdom" does not want to be "too extravagant."

Cuba is far in advance of the United States in this respect, for it is already operating a paper-pulp mill supplied by sugar-cane pulp, and the United States is importing paper made there by this process while the cane pulp in this country is either rotting or being consumed in furnaces as a waste product.

Estimates for the coming year show that the United States will produce 600,000 tons of sugar-cane pulp. Of this, only 120,000 tons can be used by the wall-board plant now operating, as that is the maximum capacity of the plant, which means that this year we are going to burn up as waste 480,000 tons of sugar-cane pulp, which if processed would have a money value of $48,000,000. This amount of revenue is the loss this year to those Southern States in which cane is the leading crop.

Frantic efforts are being made by the American Sugar Cane League to induce the Bureau of Standards to expend this magniloquent reserve of $15,000 for a cane-pulp plant, but the corn farmers are just as energetic in their demand that this sum be used for a cornstalk mill, so it appears the Bureau of Standards will be compelled to toss a coin in rendering a decision which may avoid dissension.

[This is the tenth of a series of articles suggesting that the Bureau of Standards be permitted to add an almost unbelievable revenue to the income of the American farmer resulting from experiments just completed at Washington. This survey is being made by the special Washington correspondent]

WASHINGTON, D. C., January —.—The American Sugar Cane League is ready to begin the construction of a number of sugar-cane pulp plants for the manufacture of paper pulp as quickly as Congress allows the Bureau of Standards the money necessary to construct an experimental plant to work out the most economical method of production.

These plants will be located in the States producing the most sugar-cane or in the States properly located climatically which are willing to go into cane production. At the present time there are only two States producing an extent sufficient to supply such mills. They are Texas and Louisiana, but other States may take up more cane production with the assurance of an increase in profits from its culture.

There is no danger of blight to this crop since the importation of Java cane, which is now being cultivated exclusively by the large sugar-producing States. Unlike the Japanese species, it is immune to blight and there is no danger of crop loss in future from this parasite.

Two years ago there was such a shortage of cane pulp that the wall-board plant operating in New Orleans was compelled to import from Porto Rico the pulp to manufacture its product. To bar a repetition of this disaster that company planted 95,000 acres of Java cane in Florida. This experiment demonstrated that Florida can grow cane and offers that State an opportunity to recoup the financial disaster left it by the explosion of the real-estate "boom," which skyrocketed land values beyond all conception of worth, through rehabilitation as a sugar State, which may not be so pyrotechnic but sound development.

Senator FLETCHER, of Florida, has sensed the opportunity thus afforded his State, and is advocating the growing of cane and the erection of a pulp mill.

Sugar-cane pulp not only produces newsprint paper but it can be used to manufacture the higher grades of papers ranking second only to rag paper in texture.

WASHINGTON, D. C., January —.—An increase of at least $7 an acre in the financial yield of cotton is guaranteed by the new process of saving xylos from the cottonseed bran as devised by the Bureau of Standards. The profit to the cotton planters may be even more than this to the acre, as the exact commercial value of this rare sugar has not been definitely fixed. At present it sells for $100 a pound.

Xylos is a sugar which has no food value. After the cottonseed is crushed, the oil and the cotton meal extracted, there is left what is termed "hulls." The fuzz is then taken from these hulls and sold as linters, and the remaining bran—about 1,000,000 tons a year—is burned to get it out of the way. Now comes the Bureau of Standards, and with a new process utilizes this entire bran. It has been found to contain 45 per cent xylos, and that the remainder is pure alpha cellulose, which means the entire product is marketable.

At present, xylos, on account of its very high price, has no commercial value, but this new process brings its cost down so materially that its use in commerce has now been established. It has been found the best substitute in the spinning of rayon, for glucose, and as glucose has a food value it can now be diverted to channels of animal subsistance. Xylos produces a new explosive which is superior to any now in use; it may be used for "stuffing" leather and tanning and for dyeing wool. It will take the place of lactic and acetic acids in the latter process, as it will be much cheaper. As a harmless flavoring extract for soft drinks and candies it is superior and cheaper than citric and malic acids. In fact it has so many uses that no matter how great the production it will be consumed immediately. The residue, after the extraction of xylos, being pure alpha cellulose will produce rayon silk; so, unlike many other commodities produced, there is no waste.

WASHINGTON, D. C., January —.—A recent engineering report shows that it takes more heat to warm a house in Texas in winter than it does to warm the same-sized dwelling in Minnesota. The reason for this is that in the northern climates they are now using insulating board in all new houses, while in the South they have not yet come to this mode of building. Further, this report, which is on file at the Bureau of Standards, shows that houses in which insulating board is used are cooler in summer time for the reason that the insulation keeps the outside heat out at that time of year just as it keeps the inside heat in in wintertime.

These facts were gathered for the purpose of finding the potential market for insulating board, which by a process recently invented at the Bureau of Standards will produce this wall board from straw. There being such vast quantities of straw yearly, almost all of which has to be destroyed to make room for the coming crops, it was first necessary to learn if a process to make it into wall board would be a commercial proposition. The bureau believes there will soon be a demand for at least one hundred times as much as is now produced, so there is plenty of market for the product.

The great wheat-producing States are the places at which these plants must be located. Nebraska, Kansas, Minnesota, North and South Dakota, and California offer splendid locations for these mills. Aside from the making of wall board, straw can be converted into newsprint paper with just as high a yield as cornstalks, just as the cornstalks are now being transformed into wall board at the Iowa State University at Ames, Iowa.

There is a great demand for this product on the Pacific coast, all of which has to be shipped from New Orleans. The long-distance haul makes it much more expensive than it would be were it produced from the present waste materials of the wheat fields of the Sacramento and San Joaquin Valleys.

WASHINGTON, D. C., January —.—While experiments completed by the Bureau of Standards show conclusively that potatoes are much more valuable when turned into alcohol than when sold for food, this bureau has no money with which to build such a plant and hence is forced to wait until Congress decides to allow potato production to become profitable.

In many sections of the country the market price for potatoes is so low that farmers do not receive more than the cost of the sacks used to hold them. The result of this is that often a whole potato crop is allowed to rot because of the inability to secure an amount per bushel which would be equal to even the cost of marketing them.

With the view to finding a remedy for this condition the Bureau of Standards began experiments on the chemistry of the potato. The results have more than warranted the expectations.

For some years past there has been imported into this country more than $10,000,000 worth of blackstrap molasses for the production of grain alcohol. These new experiments show potatoes can be converted into grain alcohol so successfully as to compete with this blackstrap. Also it was discovered that from them can be produced the higher grades of alcohol for which the molasses is not suitable. These higher grades sell for as much as $1 a pint for "commercial purposes." Such alcohols as propyl, banana oil, and those used to make quick-drying lacquer and so greatly in demand, may be made from the potato with profit to both the farmer and the manufacturer.

In sections where these potato plants are put in operation the bureau believes potatoes may average in value about $1 a bushel. Senator SCHALL'S bill asks for $500,000 for a potato-alcohol plant.

[This is the fourteenth of a series of articles suggesting that the Bureau of Standards be permitted to add an unbelievable sum to the income of the American farmer as the result of experiments just completed at Washington. This survey is being made by the special Washington correspondent]

WASHINGTON, D. C., January —.—That a forceful effort to secure the production of white paper from cornstalks and other field crops will be made at the coming session of Congress is indicated by a statement made to-day by Senator GUY D. GOFF, of West Virginia.

Senator GOFF is rated as perhaps the most aggressive Member of that body and the suggestion that he might be willing to lead a fight for the farmers indicates success. Another point must be remembered in this connection and that is that Herbert Hoover will soon be the President of the United States and that these developments of financial advantage to the farmer were made by the Bureau of Standards while he was the head of that department as Secretary of Commerce and that he is thoroughly acquainted with the work.

Speaking on the white-paper situation to-day Senator GOFF said:

"The recent report of the Bureau of Standards concerning the use of cornstalks in the manufacture of paper should prove of great interest to the American farmer. It will provide another market for the products of the farm and I am sure will go a long way toward increasing the income of the farmers of this country and thus will help materially toward farm relief. Many years ago I remember reading a report of the Committee on Agriculture of the House of Representatives that a ton of cornstalks could be reduced to a pulp at much less cost than is necessary to reduce a ton of wood to the same condition. Man's ingenuity is constantly devising some new use for paper, and in my opinion unless factories are started in the near future that will use some substitute, such as cornstalks, in the manufacture of paper pulp, the cost of paper will steadily rise and its use in many cases will have to be curtailed."

INTERIOR DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATIONS—CONFERENCE REPORT

Mr. SMOOT submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 15089) making appropriations for the Department of the Interior for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1930, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 15, 16, 17, 19, 22, 23, and 26.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 2, 3, 6, 7, 8, 14, 18, 21, 25, 27, 32, 34, and 38, and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 24: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 24, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the proposed insert "$1,437,550"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 28: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 28, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following: "For the purchase of a proportionate interest in the existing storage reservoir of the Warm Springs project, $230,000; in all, $236,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

And the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 37: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 37, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$219,400"; and the Senate agree to the same.

The committee of conference have not agreed on amendments numbered 1, 4, 20, 30, 39, 40, and 41.

REED SMOOT,
HENRY W. KEYES,
WM. J. HARRIS,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
LOUIS C. CRAMTON,
FRANK MURPHY,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the conference report. I desire to state to the Senate that there is virtually an agreement on all items with the exception of three. If we agree to the conference report now, we having the papers here, the report will go back to the House and then the House must determine by vote whether they will yield on three amendments or not.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I ask the Senator why we should take two bites at the cherry?

Mr. SMOOT. If the House agrees to the three amendments, that will end it. This is the way all disagreements in conference are handled.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, may I suggest that the two Senators speak a little louder? I am very much interested in the subject and should like to hear what they are saying.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. As I understand it, the procedure is necessary because of the rules of the House of Representatives.

Mr. SMOOT. Absolutely.

Mr. NORRIS. But I want to ask the Senator a question. Some amendments reported here are, as a matter of fact, as I understand it, really agreed to by the conferees of both Houses, but it will be necessary to have the approval of the House under their rules.

Mr. SMOOT. That is correct.

Mr. NORRIS. Now I want to ask the Senator if one of those amendments is an amendment offered by me on the floor of the Senate in regard to the North Platte irrigation project?

Mr. SMOOT. I will state to the Senator that it is. It is amendment numbered 30, having reference to crediting the farmers on that project with the sum of $2,276.45.

Mr. NORRIS. It has really been agreed to by the conferees?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; but it had to go back to the House under their rules.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. As I understand the matter, the report advises the Senate of an agreement by the conferees upon all items in difference between the two Houses except three items of particular interest to the Senators from the State of Montana.

Mr. SMOOT. That is true.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I do not know why the rules of the House should really affect the situation at all.

Mr. SMOOT. They do not on those three items.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Of course, the report will not be agreed to until the other matters in difference are disposed of?

Mr. SMOOT. This is only a partial report.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I understand.

Mr. SMOOT. It is to clear up all the items with the exception of the three that I have called to the attention of the Senator.

Mr. NORRIS. As I understand the House rule, it provides that a certain class of amendments going to conference can not be finally agreed to by the House conferees until they have been brought back to the House and reported to the House, and the House given an opportunity to pass on those particular amendments. I do not know whether the amendment of the Senator from Montana is in that class or not.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I understand that requirement, but that does not seem to affect the situation at all. The House conferees can easily report back to the House that the conferees have agreed upon all except certain items and ask the advice of the House with respect to those particular items. But why should that mean that the Senate must adopt a partial report?

Mr. SMOOT. It is the procedure which is always followed, so that we can dispose of all of the bill with the exception of the items which may be in dispute.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I want to express to the Senate conferees the appreciation of myself and my colleague for the active support they have given to the Senate amendment referred to. I have no doubt that they have conscientiously and diligently endeavored to support the amendments. But, of course, if everything else is disposed of except the particular items, everybody else will be in favor of a final favorable report upon the bill, so that it would concentrate everyone against the three amendments. I can see no reason whatever why we should adopt an interim report on the appropriation bill.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senate has the papers and the Senate has to take the next step. There are only two steps to take, either yield to the House or come to the Senate and ask for the adoption of a partial report, leaving the three items undetermined. If the House instructs Mr. CRAMTON, chairman of the House conferees, to yield on those three items, then the bill is completed; but if not, it goes back to conference again on those three items.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Even so, the Senate would then be obliged to take action.

Mr. SMOOT. No; not if the House yielded on the three items.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senate conferees would be obliged to report to the Senate that the House had yielded?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. Or the House itself would by message send word to the Senate that the House receded from its disagreement and agreed to the Senate amendments. Technically speaking, the report that the conference committee makes would show a further disagreement, but the House can relieve that situation by agreeing to the Senate amendments. The conferees may recommend to the House that they agree to the Senate amendments. Assuming that the House follow the advice of the conferees, then they will inform the Senate that they have agreed to the amendments.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Let us assume that the House does not agree. What then?

Mr. SMOOT. Then the bill goes back to further conference.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Exactly; and then the sole question before this body is the disposition to be made with respect to those three amendments. The Senator from Nebraska having gotten his amendment adopted in conference and other Senators being in like position, they will all be eager to have the bill passed.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator does the Senator from Nebraska an injustice. I supposed, until I heard what the Senator from Montana just said, that the Senator's amendments were in the same predicament that my amendment was.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I did not so understand it.

Mr. NORRIS. If that is not so, then I did not understand the Senator's amendment.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I confidently expected the Senator's support for those amendments.

Mr. NORRIS. When the time comes, if I am convinced that the Senator's amendments ought to be agreed to and that we could get such an agreement by a rejection of the report, I shall be glad to help the Senator. In other words, I did not know there was any difference whatever between the Senator's amendments and the one in which I was interested.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Then I must have misunderstood the Senator.

Mr. SMOOT. We have been working on this matter for days and have held meeting after meeting. We have done everything we could to come to an agreement. It finally appeared that we could not agree upon the three amendments, and the only procedure left to the Senate conferees was to bring back a partial report and have it adopted, leaving the three amendments still in dispute, and then have it referred back to the House to let the House act upon the three amendments. There is no other way.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, I desire to make an inquiry before the matter is passed upon finally. I would like to ask the chairman of the conference committee what disposition was made of the amendment adopted by the Senate affecting the payment of funds to support the Kiowa Agency at Anadarko out of the private funds of the Indians? Did the Senate conferees accept the House provision?

Mr. SMOOT. We accepted the House provision.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. The second question is in relation to the hospital at Fort Sill Indian Agency. I would like to ask what disposition was made of that amendment?

Mr. SMOOT. It went out.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. In what way?

Mr. SMOOT. We disagreed to the House provision.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. And the bill as now before the Senate provides that the hospital extension shall be made from Federal funds instead of from private funds?

Mr. SMOOT. The provision for the hospital went out of the bill. That is as I understood the Indians wanted it unless it was paid for from funds in the Federal Treasury.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. So the report as now before the Senate provides no funds from any source to extend the hospital at Fort Sill?

Mr. SMOOT. That is correct.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. The item as agreed to by the Senate conferees provides that the agency at Anadarko shall be paid for from private funds in the nature of trust funds to the credit of the Kiowa, Comanche, and Apache Indians. The fact is that those Indians have only a very small amount to their credit. It is less than a million dollars a year. The Indians have a revenue of less than $100,000 a year.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that they have an income of over a million dollars a year.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, I can not dispute the Senator here, but I live among those Indians; I know their circumstances; and I say their income is less than $100,000 a year, derived entirely from the Red River royalties and from 4 per cent upon the fund they have in the hands of the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. SMOOT. Either the Senator is wrong or the testimony given before the House committee is wrong. I remember what the Senator from Oklahoma said in regard to the matter before the committee and I looked it up.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. The fact of the case is that this bill takes money of the Indians in their trust fund to pay the expenses of the agency on their reservation to the extent of fifty-odd thousand dollars. The only trust fund they have is the one they received at the hands of Congress coming from the royalties derived from what is known as the Red River oil fields. These Indians secured that trust fund by their own efforts over the protest of the Department of Justice. They spent their own money in sending delegations to Washington; they spent their own money to hire attorneys; and after prosecuting their efforts for four years the Congress gave them this fund. Now Congress is proposing to take that fund to pay the agency expenses. I think that is wrong. The Senate committee joined in my opinion and struck out that provision and made the item payable from the Federal Treasury, from which it should be payable.

Mr. SMOOT. There are other items, I will say to the Senator, which were treated in exactly the same way, but as to which we had to yield; and of all the Indians in the United States the Indians for whom the Senator is speaking now are more capable of paying the amount out of their own funds than any of the others.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. That statement, Mr. President, I think will not be borne out by the record, because the Osages have millions to their credit, while these Indians have less than $1,000,000 to their credit.

Mr. SMOOT. The Osage Indians pay the expense out of their funds.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. If this procedure is followed it will be only two or three years when the Indians will have no funds whatever, and then we shall have to pay their agency expenses from the Federal Treasury or else the agency must be abolished.

Mr. SMOOT. When that time comes that is exactly what we will do.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. It occurs to me that that is a very bad precedent to set before three tribes of Indians when we are seeking to teach the ways of civilization.

Mr. SMOOT. I think, perhaps, it would be a bad precedent to say to one tribe of Indians who have money on hand and an income of over a million dollars that the Government of the United States should pay all expenses such as we are here considering. There are other tribes which, of course, have no money at all, and the Government pays such expenses for them; and so it will in the case of this tribe of Indians if the time shall ever come when they have no funds with which to pay the expense. That is the position the House of Representatives takes; it has been the policy in the past; and the House refused to depart from the policy which has been followed.

I wish to assure the Senator, however, that the testimony before the House committee—and I have sent for it and I will show it to him—is that these particular Indians have over a million dollars income. I mean that the Indians, as a tribe, have that amount of income.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. If the Senator can produce testimony showing that the Indians have an income such as he suggests, I will withdraw my objection. The fact is that their income is less than $100,000 a year; and it is now proposed that one-half of that total income shall be used to maintain an agency to supervise their business operations. I think that is wrong, and I protest against that policy. I ask that the consideration of the conference report be delayed until this item can be investigated.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not know what more can be said than has been said. The House would not yield its opposition to the Senate amendment. The House conferees took the position that so long as the Indians have an income they ought to pay the expenses of the tribe; but just the moment it shall happen, if it ever shall happen, that they have no funds with which to make the payment, we will treat them just as we treat all other Indians who have no tribal funds whatever. That is the position which has been taken in the past; it has not been changed; and the House insists that that policy shall be pursued.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, let me remark that there seems to be quite a difference between the two Senators, one asserting that the total assets of the tribe are not to exceed a million dollars and the other asserting that they have an annual income of a million dollars. Of course, if they have an income of $1,000,000——

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Then I will withdraw my objection.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. There is no reason why the Government of the United States, out of the General Treasury, should pay for a hospital for them. I suggest that the Senator from Oklahoma ask that the report go over until later in the day, when he can advise himself definitely as to that.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I shall object to the consideration of the conference report until this item as to the income of these particular Indians has been adjusted between the Senator from Utah and myself.

Mr. SMOOT. Here is what the testimony says. Their income last year was approximately $2,053,545.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Who gave that testimony?

Mr. SMOOT. That was given by Mr. Meritt.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. That is absolutely wrong.

Mr. SMOOT. I will read the remainder of the testimony.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Very well. Let the Senator read it all.

Mr. SMOOT. I will read the testimony:

> The Indians have attained a rather high degree of civilization through contact with the incoming whites and they live under measurably equal economic and social conditions. Their income last year was approximately $2,053,545, including $623,618 from agricultural leases; $121,823, grazing leases; $301,275, land sales; $375,000, crops sold and consumed; $300,000, salaries and wages; $100,000, per capita payments; $53,045, oil and gas leases; $52,500, livestock and other sources.

Making a total of $2,053,545.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, this report takes into consideration the amount that these Indians produced on their farms on the basis of an estimate made. There are 6,000 Indians on this reservation. Perhaps from their allotments it may be true, from an estimated standpoint, that they have collectively among them produced that amount of wealth; but the tribal fund is what I am speaking about.

Mr. SMOOT. Let me continue with the picture, so that the Senate may determine whether we will be hard upon these Indians if the proposed action is taken:

> Their individual Indian property is worth approximately $23,318,588, including land, $17,605; homes and furniture, $3,100,000; Liberty bonds and money in bank, $1,463,524; implements and machinery, $24,247; livestock, $270,957; and other property—

Not here listed.

I submit to the Senate that Indians with that amount of property, and with that amount of income, can at least afford to pay $50,000 for maintaining the agency out of the income they receive. If these Indians shall ever become, as are other Indians in other agencies who have no income whatever, totally dependent upon the Government, they will be treated exactly the same as other Indians in such circumstances are treated; but it seems to me, in view of what they have in the way of assets and income, that they can well afford to pay. If the Senator wants me to do so, I can give him a detailed statement of their income and property; but under the circumstances I do not think that they are going to feel very badly about paying $50,000 for maintaining the agency.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, I live among those Indians; there are 6,000 of them; they are scattered in probably five counties. At the time of the allotment each Indian was given an allotment of 160 acres, and most of those Indians now have allotments, especially the older ones, and it may be true that these 6,000 Indians living on 6,000 allotments are producing a total each year of hay and corn and livestock and hogs that may be estimated to be worth $2,000,000; but I make the positive statement that these tribes of Indians, the Kiowas, Comanches, and Apaches, have in their trust fund to-day less than the sum of $1,000,000. I make the further positive statement that their total income is less, approximately, than $100,000; and this bill proposes now to take one-half of that total income in order to maintain the agency at Anadarko.

Mr. SMOOT. They certainly would get the interest on their Liberty bonds, would they not?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. These Indians have the Liberty bonds and deposits in banks as their own private property.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; and for that reason we also took into consideration the condition of the Indians themselves. They have $1,463,524 in Liberty bonds and deposits in bank.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I think these Indians should be given credit if they have that amount of Liberty bonds in their possession.

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly; but I do not think these Indians ought to feel that they should be paupers, so far as the Government is concerned. I think Indians who have worked and put themselves in the position in which these Indians now are are to be commended, but I do not think they should be treated as paupers.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. In that viewpoint these Indians should be absolved from any agency supervision. If they hold Liberty bonds and deposits of over a million dollars why should they have an agency and be compelled to pay the expense to the amount of $50,000 a year?

Mr. SMOOT. Does the Senator know of their ever asking to be released from it?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I have not been here very long.

Mr. SMOOT. I have never heard such a suggestion.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. They are protesting now against the payment to the expenses of this Indian agency out of their tribal funds.

Mr. SMOOT. We treat them just the same as we treat all other Indians who have incomes sufficient to pay such expenses. I will repeat, however, that if these Indians should ever find themselves in such a position that they could not maintain this payment, if they should at any subsequent time have no income at all, there is no question but that adequate appropriations would be made for them, exactly as appropriations are made for other Indians in similar conditions.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, I want to protest against this conference report. The sum for the maintenance of this agency should come from the Federal Government. It is unfair to these Indians to take what little funds they have for this particular purpose, especially a fund that came to them in the manner in which this fund came. I understand that I have no power to prevent the adoption of the conference report, but I wish to enter my protest against the policy which it follows.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I should like to say to the Senator that all the other Indian tribes that have incomes pay such expenses, and the amount is taken out of their tribal funds. I call attention to the fact in this connection that the Montana Blackfeet pay in similar fashion; that the Minnesota consolidated Chippewas also pay; that the Nevada-Carson Indians pay; and New Mexico Indians pay. Why should this tribe, the richest of all the Indians, be eliminated? There is no reason for it; and it would not be right, Mr. President, to provide that they should not do so.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the conference report?

Mr. WHEELER. I object to the consideration of the report.

Mr. SMOOT. Then, Mr. President, I think that we might just as well settle the matter; and I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the conference report on the Interior Department appropriation bill, being House bill 15089.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Utah to proceed to the consideration of the conference report.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum being suggested, the clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Couzens	Glenn	La Follette

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eighty-six Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT].

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the junior Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER] advises me that he has not with him the papers which he will need to proceed with the discussion of this item, and he therefore asks that it go over until to-morrow. I am perfectly willing that that shall be done; but I desire to give notice that to-morrow morning, as early as possible, I shall call up the conference report for consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The report will lie on the table.

ELK HILLS OIL RESERVE

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, on January 2 the Supreme Court of the United States handed down a decision and opinion in the case of Roy O. West, Secretary of the Interior, petitioner, against Standard Oil Co., the importance of which does not seem to have been appreciated, or at least expressed, through the press. This suit involves section No. 36, 640 acres of land in the very heart of naval reserve No. 1, the Elk Hills reserve, in the State of California, out of which, according to testimony taken before the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys, the Standard Oil Co. has already taken oil to the value of over $10,000,000. The suit presents the question as to whether this particular property belongs to the Government of the United States or whether it has passed to the State of California and from the State of California to the Standard Oil Co.

The State of California, like many Western States, secured from the Government of the United States a grant of sections 16 and 36, nonmineral, for educational purposes. The question as to whether the land is mineral or nonmineral is determined as of the time when the actual Government survey was made, in this particular case in the year 1903.

Prior to that time, about the year 1900, representations were made to the Department of the Interior that entries of lands in that section of the State of California were being made under the agricultural land acts, it being represented that the lands were agricultural in character and not mineral, whereas as a matter of fact it was quite generally believed, if not known, that the land was chiefly valuable for the deposits of oil in it. Accordingly the Secretary of the Interior put out an order suspending from entry entirely all lands within a certain extensive area in that section, including the entire Elk Hills reserve and the particular land in controversy in this litigation.

The survey was then made; and the surveyor reported, when the survey was made in the year 1903, that the land was in fact mineral in character—not only this particular section but all of the land in that immediate vicinity. Not only that, but in his field notes, filed with the report of his survey, he went into detail and explained the reasons for the conclusion at which he had arrived.

However, in the following year, a representative of the department was sent out to make a study of the neighborhood, and he reported that this particular land—this section 36 and other adjacent sections—were nonmineral in character; and thereupon, the order therefore made by the Secretary of the Interior withdrawing the lands from entry was vacated.

Upon that foundation the State of California set up title to this section 36, and conveyed it to the Standard Oil Co., which has occupied the land since that time, its title dating from somewhere about 1909 or 1910.

About the same time, however, the Southern Pacific Co., under its lieu-land selection, selected other lands adjacent to this particular tract, claiming that these lands were likewise nonmineral, and patents were issued to the Southern Pacific Co. for these lands; but it was afterwards believed that these patents had been fraudulently obtained, and with knowledge upon the part of the Southern Pacific Co. that the lands were as a matter of fact mineral in character; and another investigation was started, and was being prosecuted in the year 1912, with the result that the investigators reached the conclusion that all of the lands—not only those embraced within the patent to the Southern Pacific Co. but this section 36—were in fact mineral in character.

I might say that as a result of that, suit was instituted for the purpose of cancelling the patent to the adjacent lands issued to the Southern Pacific Railroad Co.; and as a result of that suit, by virtue of the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, those patents were canceled, the Supreme Court holding that the evidence was amply sufficient to justify the conclusion that the whole area was mineral in character. That case is reported in Two hundred and fifty-first United States 1, the case of United States against Southern Pacific Co.

This information then coming to the Secretary of the Interior, he directed that proceedings be instituted before the land office at Visalia, Calif., for the purpose of determining the question as to whether the lands were or were not mineral in character; that is to say, whether they were known to be mineral at the time of the Government survey in 1903. He issued an order to that effect, which was transmitted to the chief of field division at San Francisco in the year 1913, and there was lost, and remained lost for seven years, until it was finally unearthed by an officer who was a successor of the man to whom it had been originally transmitted.

It was discovered in the year 1913 among the files of the office of the chief of field division in the city of San Francisco and transmitted in some consternation to the Secretary of the Interior, who was then the Hon. John Barton Payne, who forthwith directed that the proceedings initiated in 1913 go forward; and steps were being taken to carry on the inquiry as to the mineral or nonmineral character of this land when Mr. Payne retired as Secretary of the Interior and was succeeded by Albert B. Fall.

Thereupon the attorney for the Standard Oil Co. appeared before Mr. Fall and represented that all power over the matter on the part of the Department of the Interior had terminated when the report of the special investigator was turned in and the order withdrawing the lands from entry was vacated. The matter was argued out before Secretary Fall on the proposition of law thus asserted, together with another principle advanced by the counsel for the Standard Oil Co. to which I need not refer. Anyway, as the result of this inquiry, Secretary Fall dismissed the proceedings for the purpose of determining the character of the land. That was in the year 1922.

As a result of the investigation conducted by the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys, however, the Senate adopted a resolution directing the then Secretary, Doctor Work, to reinstate the proceedings; and they were again going forward, now for the third time, when suit was instituted by the Standard Oil Co. in the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia to enjoin the Secretary of the Interior from prosecuting the inquiry, upon the contention that all power in the premises in the Department of the Interior had terminated, first by reason of the investigation made in 1904, and second by reason of the determination made by Secretary Fall.

That contention was sustained by the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, and a judgment granting a permanent injunction was entered. From that judgment an appeal was taken to the District Court of Appeals, which affirmed the judgment of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, holding that the title had finally passed to the State of California and the Standard Oil.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President——

Mr. WALSH of Montana. From that judgment an appeal was taken to the Supreme Court of the United States, which reversed the judgment of the District Court of Appeals, holding that no such effect could be given, in the law, to either the action of the Secretary vacating the order withdrawing the lands from entry in 1904 or to the determination by Secretary Fall.

The result of the judgment of the Supreme Court of the United States is that the investigation will now go forward, and the inquiry will be prosecuted as to whether these lands were or were not mineral in character in the year 1903, and only so.

In view of the decision and judgment in the case of United States against Southern Pacific, in Two hundred and fifty-first United States Reports, it seems altogether reasonable to expect that the adjudication will be in favor of the Government of the United States.

It will be interesting in this connection to recall, likewise, that it was because the Standard Oil was at that time taking the oil out of section 36 that Secretary Fall gave to Mr. Doheny a lease of the entire Elk Hills reserve, it being contended that so much oil was being withdrawn by private exploiters that it would be impossible to retain the rest in the ground.

I now yield to the Senator from California.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. The supreme court here decided in favor of the company.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Supreme Court of the District of Columbia.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. The court of appeals reversed the lower court.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Oh, no.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. It reversed the decision of the other court?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. No.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. It affirmed it; yes. I did not hear the Senator's earlier remark.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Yes.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. From which an appeal was taken, and the decision of the court of appeals was reversed by the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Both of the courts in the District of Columbia decided in favor of the company. It is an interesting thing that in this whole litigation the Government does not seem to be able to make any progress whatever in the courts of the District of Columbia, but it finds a more hospitable ear in the Supreme Court of the United States.

I ought to say that the decision is by a unanimous court, with the exception of Mr. Justice Stone, who did not participate in the decision by reason of the fact that he had some connection with the transaction as Attorney General prior to his appointment to the bench.

I ask that the opinion of the Supreme Court be incorporated in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FESS in the chair). Is there objection?

There being no objection, the opinion was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Supreme Court of the United States

(No. 71.—October term, 1928)

Roy O. West, Secretary of the Interior, petitioner, v. Standard Oil Co.—On certiorari to the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia

January 2, 1929

Mr. Justice Brandeis delivered the opinion of the court.

This suit was brought in October, 1925, by the Standard Oil Co. in the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia against Doctor Work, the then Secretary of the Interior, to enjoin the continuation of proceedings in the local land office at Visalia, Calif., ordered by him with a view to ascertaining and determining whether particular lands were known to be mineral in character when the survey of them was accepted. State of California, Standard Oil Co., transferees (51 L. D. 141). Upon his resignation, Secretary West was substituted as defendant. The proceedings were of the kind commonly employed by the Secretary of the Interior to ascertain the existence of alleged facts reported by a representative of the General Land Office, because of which the title of one claiming public lands is questioned in the department. The register and receiver, after hearing the parties in interest, make report of their findings. These are subject to an appeal, on the evidence, to the land commissioner, and also to a further appeal to the Secretary. Upon the ultimate findings the commissioner decides, subject to the supervision and control of the Secretary, what action, if any, shall be taken. Compare George W. Dally (41 L. D. 295, 299). Circular No. 460, February 26, 1916 (44 L. D. 572), prescribes the procedure.

The proceedings here involved concern section 36, township 30 south, range 23 east, Mount Diabolo base and meridian—that land being in Elk Hills, Kern County, Calif. Section 36 is one of the sections in each township which, if not mineral or otherwise disposed of, was granted by Congress to the State of California in aid of public schools by act of March 3, 1853 (c. 145, sec. 6, 10 Stat. 244, 246). Under patents issued by the State in 1910, and mesne conveyances, the Standard Oil Co. claims title to part, and an interest in the rest, of the section. Drilling on this land, begun in 1918, has been followed by extensive oil-mining operations. The proceedings were based on a charge that on January 26, 1903, the date of the approval of the survey, the land was known to be mineral in character. If the land was then known to be mineral, the title confessedly did not pass by the act, for Congress excluded mineral land from the grant. (Mining Co. v. Consolidated Mining Co., 102 U. S. 167; Mullan v. United States, 118 U. S. 271, 276. See also Wyoming v. United States, 255 U. S. 489, 500; Work v. Louisiana, 269 U. S. 250, 257–258.) If it was not then known to be mineral, the legal title passed to the State on that date, for the land was within one of the sections in place designated in the granting act. (United States v. Morrison, 240 U. S. 192; United States v. Sweet, 245 U. S. 563.)

The act of 1853 here involved, like those granting school lands to many other States,[1] makes no provision for determining what part of the land is thus excluded from the grant. It does not provide for the issue of patents or for any equivalent action by the department to evidence the transfer of title to the State. No patent to the State, or evidence of title or interest in another, has in fact been issued by the Secretary of the Interior. Nor has there been in the department any contest between the State and another claimant which might have resulted in a determination of the character of the land. Whether this land was known to be mineral at the date of the survey must, therefore, be established otherwise. The Standard Oil Co. contends that its nonmineral character had, before Secretary Work's order, been established by a final determination in the department; that thereby the department lost jurisdiction over the land and that for this reason continuation of the proceedings should be enjoined.[2]

It is true that among the several officers of the Land Department action had repeatedly been taken having some relation to the character of the land prior to the order of Secretary Work. The survey, which was approved January 26, 1903, returned it as mineral. In 1904 a special agent reported it as nonmineral. In 1908 it was temporarily withdrawn from agricultural entry pending examination and classification by the United States Geological Survey. In 1909 the Director of the Geological Survey classified it as oil land. In 1910, the Secretary recommended its withdrawal for a petroleum reserve and the recommendation was approved by the President. In 1912, it was placed in Naval Petroleum Reserve No. 1. On January 14, 1914, the proceedings in the land office here involved were initiated. The papers having been mislaid or misfiled in the local office, the proceedings lay dormant; and process was not served until after March 2, 1921. Then the register and receiver were ordered by the land commissioner, under Secretary Payne, to proceed in accordance with Circular No. 460. On June 9, 1921, before further action thereon, Secretary Fall directed the land commissioner to dismiss the proceedings and notify all parties in interest of the dismissal.

On May 8, 1925, Secretary Work vacated Secretary Fall's order and directed the register and receiver to proceed to a hearing of the charge that the land was known to be mineral in character on January 26, 1903.[3] If at the time of Secretary Work's order the department still had jurisdiction of the land, he possessed the power to review the action of his predecessor and to deal with the matter as freely as he could have done if the dismissal of the proceedings had been his own act or that of a subordinate official. For, so long as the department retains jurisdiction of the land, administrative orders concerning it are subject to revision. (New Orleans v. Paine, 147 U. S. 261; Beley v. Naphtaly, 169 U. S. 353, 364; Lane v. Darlington, 249 U. S. 331; Parcher v. Gillen, 26 L. D. 34; Aspen Consolidated Mining Co. v. Williams, 27 L. D. 1.) Compare Louisiana v. Garfield (211 U. S. 70, 75). If, on the other hand, either Secretary Fall's order of dismissal, or some earlier action of the Government, terminated the jurisdiction of the department, Secretary Work's order reinstating the proceedings was a nullity; and the Standard Oil Co. is entitled to enjoin their continuance. (Noble v. Union River Logging Railroad, 147 U. S. 165; Lane v. Watts, 234 U. S. 525; Burke v. Southern Pacific R. R. Co., 234 U. S. 669, 686.)

In support of its contention that the jurisdiction had ended, the company relied in its bill upon two earlier acts of the department, besides Secretary Fall's order, as constituting a final determination that the land was not known to be mineral at the date of the approval of the survey. The Supreme Court of the District did not pass on the legal effect of the two other acts. Upon the stipulated facts it ruled and found: (1) That Secretary Fall had jurisdiction to determine the known mineral character of section 36, without awaiting the trial by the local land office and appeals from the findings there made. (2) That the Secretary granted a hearing before himself for the purpose of determining the issues raised by the proceedings and gave notice to all parties in interest of such hearing. (3) That he had before him evidence which he had a right to consider and which supported his dismissal of the proceedings. (4) That he dismissed the proceedings after a consideration of the law and facts and directed that the parties in interest be notified of the dismissal and that the case be closed on the records. (5) That the order of dismissal was reduced to writing by his direction and was a judicial determination of the known mineral character of the land on January 26, 1903. (6) That the order of dismissal reduced to writing was a judgment on the merits, and its correctness could not be questioned by collateral proceedings, except for fraud. A decree for a permanent injunction was entered. That decree was affirmed by the Court of Appeals of the District. (57 Dist. App. 329, 23 F. (2d) 750.) This court granted a writ of certiorari. (276 U. S. 613.)

Ordinarily, where an act granting public lands excludes those known to be mineral, the determination of the fact whether a particular tract is of that character rests with the Secretary of the Interior. (See

[1] See Joint Hearings before Senate Committee on Public Lands and Surveys and House Committee on the Public Lands on S. 3078 and H. R. 9182, to assure title to granted school lands, Feb. 11 and 12, 1926; Report of Senate Committee No. 603, Apr. 5 [16], 1926, 69th Cong., 1st sess.; Report of House Committee No. 1617, Dec. 9, 1926, 69th Cong., 2d sess.; No. 1761, Jan. 13, 1927, 69th Cong., 2d sess.; 67 CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, p. 8424; 68 CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, pp. 1815, 1820, 2015, 2581. See also Hearings of subcommittee, 69th Cong., 1st sess., pursuant to S. Res. 347, vol. 2, pp. 1997–2062.

[2] By reason of subsection (c) of sec. 1 of the act of Jan. 25, 1927 (44 Stat. 1026), the proceedings here involved are not affected by that act. (See 52 L. D. 51–54.)

[3] This action was taken after a joint resolution of Congress, dated Feb. 21, 1924 (43 Stat. 15). It is conceded that this fact has no legal significance in the case. The basis on which Secretary Work proceeded is shown in his decision reported in 51 Land Decisions 141.

Cameron v. United States, 252 U. S. 450, 464; Burke v. Southern Pacific R. R. Co., 234 U. S. 669, 684–87.) But compare Dunbar Lime Co. v. Utah-Idaho Sugar Co. (17 F. (2d) 351).

If such act provides for the issue of a patent, whether it be to pass the title or to furnish evidence that it has passed, the patent imports that final determination of the nonmineral character of the land has been made. The issue of the patent terminates the jurisdiction of the department over the land. (See Barden v. Northern Pacific R. R., 154 U. S. 288, 327–331; Courtright v. Wisconsin Central R. R. Co., 19 L. D. 410; Heirs of C. H. Creciat, 40 L. D. 623.) And in the courts the patent is accepted, upon a collateral attack, as affording conclusive evidence of the nonmineral character. (Smelting Co. v. Kemp, 104 U. S. 636, 640, 641; Barden v. Northern Pacific R. R., 154 U. S. 288, 327.) Similarly, if the granting act provides for other action by the Secretary equivalent to a patent, such as approval of a list of the lands, the approval ends the jurisdiction of the department (Cole v. Washington, 37 L. D. 387; Sewell A. Knapp, 47 L. D. 152); and it, likewise, imports that the necessary determination has been made. (Chandler v. Calumet & Hecla Mining Co., 149 U. S. 79. Compare Fred S. Porter, 50 L. D. 528, 532–533.) Even where the granting act does not require either the issue of a patent to the grantee or such equivalent action, the Secretary may have occasion to make a determination of the known mineral character of the land, as when rights adverse to the grantee are asserted under the mineral, leasing, or other laws. (See Work v. Braffet, 276 U. S. 560; Albert E. Dorff, 50 L. D. 219; Utah v. Lichliter, 50 L. D. 231; George G. Frandsen, 50 L. D. 516.) In such event the issue of the patent, or other instrument evidencing title, likewise imports that the determination has been made. (Steel v. Smelting Co., 106 U. S. 447, 451. Compare State of Louisiana, 30 L. D. 626.) (Or, in every such case, the determination of the mineral character is a prerequisite to the authority exercised in the performance of a duty imposed. (Smelting Co. v. Kemp, 104 U. S. 636, 640–641.)

The Standard Oil Co. contends that Secretary Fall determined that the land was not known to be mineral on January 26, 1903; and that this determination in the informal hearing before him was legally an equivalent of a determination of the fact in formal proceedings before the register and receiver under circular No. 460. We agree that if Secretary Fall had determined as a fact that the land was not then known to be mineral, his order dismissing the proceedings would have had the same legal effect as if it had followed the more formal procedure prescribed by circular No. 460. For the Secretary is not obliged to employ proceedings in the local land office as the means for making the determination as to the known mineral character. He could himself hear the evidence in the first instance. Nor is he obliged, in so ascertaining the facts, to follow a procedure similar to that prescribed for the local land office. (See Knight v. U. S. Land Association, 142 U. S. 161, 177–178.) We assume without deciding, that if Secretary Fall had determined as a fact that the land was not known to be mineral on January 26, 1903, his order dismissing the proceedings would have ended the jurisdiction of the department over the land. And this determination would, ordinarily, be conclusive on the courts, even if there were demonstrable error in the admission or appreciation of evidence. (See Shepley v. Cowan, 91 U. S. 330, 340; Lee v. Johnson, 116 U. S. 48, 49.) But we are of the opinion that Secretary Fall did not make a determination of that fact.

Secretary Fall's order is embodied in a letter sent by his direction to the Commissioner of the General Land Office, which after referring to the proceedings before the register and receiver, says:

"The transferees of the State of California, representatives of the Department of Justice, and of the Navy Department appeared before Secretary Fall on June 8, 1921, and presented the matter orally, whereupon, after consideration of the law and facts involved, the Secretary verbally directed that the proceedings be dismissed. You are therefore authorized and directed to dismiss the proceedings against the State of California and its transferees in re said sections 16 and 36. Notify all parties in interest of the dismissal and close the case upon your records."

The letter embodying Secretary Fall's direction to dismiss the proceedings does not state why he did so. The company argues that the dismissal was an order judicial in its nature; that in form the order is a judgment on the merits; that this judgment conclusively implies a finding of the fact that the land was not known to be mineral at the date of the approval of the survey; and that no evidence is admissible to contradict what the order imparts.

It may be assumed that the hearing was conducted in the judicial manner; that it was what is often called a quasi-judicial proceeding. But the order of dismissal is not a judgment.[4] (Compare Dickson v. Luck Land Co., 242 U. S. 371, 374.) It was an administrative act. And unlike such administrative acts as a patent or the approval of a list of lands pursuant to a duty imposed upon the Secretary, the order of dismissal does not carry the implication that all determinations essential to the passing of title have been made. Since it does not, there may be inquiry in pais to ascertain whether Secretary Fall actually made such a determination. To that end the occurrences leading up to the entry of the order of dismissal may be examined. (Compare Parcher v. Gillen, 26 L. D. 34; Harkrader v. Goldstein, 31 L. D. 87.)

In the oral argument of counsel for the company in this court there was perhaps a suggestion that Secretary Fall actually passed upon the known mineral character of the land as of January 26, 1903, when the survey was approved. But no such contention is made in the brief filed here. And when the occurrences which preceded the making of the order are examined it becomes clear that Secretary Fall made no determination of the contested issue of fact, which was to be the subject of a hearing before the local officers if he deemed the issue material. He rested his order of dismissal on a supposed rule of law, holding, on the admitted facts, that the actual known mineral character of January 26, 1903, was not of legal significance. In so ruling he yielded to the argument of counsel for the Standard Oil Co., who insisted that the then known mineral character had become immaterial, because the Government was estopped by action taken prior to 1921 from questioning the company's title. The brief filed by counsel with Secretary Fall prior to his granting the hearing; the notice of the proposed hearing before Secretary Fall on June 8, 1921, given by the department to the Attorney General and the Secretary of the Navy; and the stenographic report of that hearing establish that this was the only matter considered by Secretary Fall.

That brief was entitled an "argument in support of the request that the Secretary of the Interior decide that in view of the previous action of the department and of its regulations in force in January, 1903, the title to said section is vested in the State of California or its grantees."[5] The notice recited that the Standard Oil Co. and the Pan American Oil Co. had "asked to be heard orally in the matter of proposed proceeding by the Government to determine whether or not said section passed to the State of California under its school grant." The hearing consisted of an oral statement by counsel for the company, interrupted from time to time by questions or remarks. The statement was not a recital of evidence in support of the factual assertion that the land was not known to be mineral on January 26, 1903. It was an argument in support of the legal proposition that the proceedings should be closed without deciding that issue of fact, because certain rules of law arising from past action of the department as well as controlling equities estopped the Government from denying that the title had passed.[6] The conclusion that Secretary Fall did not deter-

[4] The department has repeatedly ruled that its decisions are not to be controlled by the same strict doctrine of res judicata which obtains as to judgments of the courts. (Osborn v. Knight, 23 L. D. 216, 218; Joseph Pretzel, 24 L. D. 64, 65; Ernest B. Gates, 41 L. D. 384. Compare Howard A. Robinson, 43 L. D. 221.)

[5] The brief states: "There is no reason why this decision as to the title of the State should not be made now, without putting the State to the enormous and costly burden of proof, such as was in issue in the Elk Hills case. (United States v. Southern Pacific Co., 251 U. S. 1.) In other words, if the absence of clear proof of the mineral character of the section in 1903 in the shape of discovery of mineral was sufficient to characterize the land as nonmineral under the regulations and repeated decisions of the department, it will make no difference that by the application of the principles of the Elk Hills case it could be successfully shown that the land within the reasoning of that decision was believed to be mineral land."

[6] The prior action relied upon as vesting title in the State and its transferees was: (1) The fact that the land was classified as nonmineral in 1904, when upon receipt of a report from Special Agent Ryan that it was nonmineral it was relieved from suspension; (2) the fact that on March 6, 1903, the department adopted an administrative rule respecting school land grants that the State would not be permitted to make lieu selections based on the alleged mineral character of land within a school section unless it proved that there had been actual discovery or exposure of mineral thereon. Mr. Sutro argued that since under this rule the State could not have made the land the base for a lieu selection it was legally entitled to retain it; and having acted on the rule its transferees were unaffected by later decisions of this court (Diamond Coal Co. v. United States, 233 U. S. 236; United States v. Southern Pacific Co., 255 U. S. 1) inconsistent with the rule. In closing he said:

"And I submit that in this case, where there is no fraud, no possible allegation of fraud, where the State five years after the classification of this land sold it in good faith to people who bought it in good faith and who held it for 10 years,. and who have now invested some millions of dollars in the land, that the time has passed when the United States can assert its title thereto, and that the United States is estopped by the judgment of this department that this was nonmineral land in 1904 and by its own regulations which defined it as nonmineral land in 1903. Now, if you will ask me what it is I am asking you to do I will say it is this: I am asking the department to close this case on the ground that the title is in the State and there is nothing further to investigate." Secretary Fall then said: "What you are asking now is that if convinced that the rule is as you state it, that instead of allowing this case to go to a hearing, and then in event I would hold with you, so deciding at that time, that if I am with you I should decide it at this time and prevent the delay in the trial?" After some further discussion Secretary Fall asked: "Is Mr. Sutro's statement of the case practically admitted?" First Assistant Secretary Finney answered: "I think that is substantially the case." Whereupon the Secretary said: "The contest will be dismissed."

mine the known mineral character of the land on January 26, 1903, is alone consistent with the stipulated facts.[7]

Most significant among the stipulated facts is the following: "It was the contention of the transferees from the State, with which contention Assistant Secretary Finney disagreed at the hearing, that it could serve no purpose to take evidence in the local land office to determine the question whether or not said section or the lands adjacent thereto showed structural and geological conditions indicative in 1903 of the existence of oil on said section under conditions justifying developments therefor for the reason that said questions presented an immaterial question of fact, and said question was not argued or discussed at the proceedings held on June 8, 1921, or at any conferences prior thereto between the representatives of the transferees and the Secretary of the Interior or the First Assistant Secretary of the Interior, except as shown in the brief and in the transcript of proceedings." [The stenographic report of the hearing above referred to.]

Thus, Secretary Fall did not hear evidence or make a determination on the issue of fact as to the known mineral character of the land within the meaning of the decisions in Diamond Coal Co. v. United States (233 U. S. 236) and Southern Pacific Co. v. United States (251 U. S. 1); and this because he deemed the fact in issue of no legal significance. It is true that in making the ruling of law that the Standard Oil Co.'s title was unassailable, the Secretary undertook to pass upon the merits of its claim to the land. For he concluded that, because of the conceded facts, urged by the company's counsel as creating an estoppel, the United States was precluded from questioning the title of the State and its transferees. But that decision could not end the jurisdiction of the department unless Congress conferred upon the Secretary of the Interior authority to determine the validity of the company's claim to the land, as a matter of law, without passing upon the contested issue of fact. To that question we now address ourselves.

Where, by the terms of an act, the Secretary is required, upon application of the claimant, to issue a patent, as in Michigan Land & Lumber Co. v. Rust (168 U. S. 589, 592); or to certify a list, as in Frasher v. O'Connor (115 U. S. 102, 115–116); or to approve a location for a right of way, as in Noble v. Union River Logging Railroad (147 U. S. 165); or to make a survey and approve a selection, as in Shaw v. Kellogg (170 U. S. 312), Congress, by implication, confers upon the Secretary the power to make all determinations of law as well as of fact which are essential to the performance of the duty specifically imposed.

After issue of the patent or other like instrument, his findings of facts are conclusive, in the absence of fraud or mistake, not only upon the department, but upon the courts, De Cambra v. Rogers (189 U. S. 119); Love v. Flahive (205 U. S. 195, 198); and though his rulings on matters of law are reviewable in the courts, Doolen v. Carr (125 U. S. 618, 625); Wisconsin Central R. R. v. Forsythe (159 U. S. 46, 61), they are not subject to reexamination by the department. Johnson v. Towsley (13 Wall. 72, 83–84). For in making such determinations he acts as a special tribunal with judicial functions. Riverside Oil Co. v. Hitchcock (190 U. S. 316, 324).

But here no similar affirmative duty rested upon the Secretary to the performance of which the determination of the question of law was incidental. Secretary Fall owed no active duty to the State or to any other claimant. His duty in respect to the land was solely that owed to the United States—the duty to preserve its interests therein. The inquiry directed to be made in the local land office had been ordered by a predecessor solely in the performance of that duty. If as a result of the inquiry it should be found that the land was known to be mineral, the Government would, if necessary, bring legal proceedings for possession and for damages or an accounting. If it should be found that the land was not known to be mineral, there would be no occasion for any further departmental action. Secretary Fall had, of course, the power to vacate the order of his predecessor that the register and receiver proceed with the investigation. For it is within the discretion of every Secretary to decide what investigations he shall pursue in the public interest; and no Secretary is obliged to continue an inquiry which he believes to be futile. But the question here is whether he can by action other than the final determination of fact, preclude resumption of the inquiry in the department, and thereby vest the title of known mineral land in the State.

We think that Congress did not confer upon the Secretary of the Interior the power to pass generally upon the right of the State to the land. When the Secretary has the duty to issue a patent or to furnish other evidence of title of a claimant, he must have authority to determine the questions of law incident to the performance of that duty. (Litchfield v. Register, 9 Wall. 575, 577–578). But here no such duty rested upon him. (Compare Louisiana v. Garfield, 211 U. S. 70, 77.) Authority to determine as a fact the known mineral character of the lands falls naturally to the Secretary as "the supervising agent of the Government to do justice to all claimants and preserve the rights of the people of the United States" to public lands. (Knight v. U. S. Land Association, 142 U. S. 161, 178.) But that authority does not carry the power to relinquish the jurisdiction of the department over the land without determining, as a fact, that it was nonmineral at the time of the approval of the survey. (Compare Work v. Louisiana, 269 U. S. 250, 261.) The broad power of control and supervision conferred upon the Secretary "does not clothe him with any discretion to enlarge or curtail the rights of the grantee, nor to substitute his judgment for the will of Congress as manifested in the granting act." (Payne v. Central Pacific Railway Co., 255 U. S. 228, 236. See, also, Burfenning v. Chicago, St. Paul, etc., Ry., 163 U. S. 321; Daniels v. Wagner, 237 U. S. 547, 558.) To read into the legislation, under such circumstances, authority to pass upon the State's claim of right to the land, regardless of its known mineral character, would create, by implication, a power in direct contravention of the expressed intention of Congress that mineral lands were not granted to the State. Thus, the Secretary would be constituted an agent rather for relinquishing than for preserving the rights of the United States in the public lands. (See Shaw v. Kellogg, 170 U. S. 312, 337–338.)

When Secretary Fall undertook to determine, not as a fact whether the land was known to be mineral in 1903, but as a proposition of law that, because of other conceded facts, the company's title had become unassailable, he acted without authority; and the order of dismissal based thereon did not remove the land from the jurisdiction of the department.

Clerk Supreme Court, United States.

[7] The land lies within naval petroleum reserve No. 1; a part of it is immediately adjacent to that involved in United States v. Southern Pacific Co. (251 U. S. 1), which was rendered in 1919. The fact that the proceedings were pending was not discovered by the chief of the field division of the land office until the close of 1920. In February, 1921, the importance of taking immediate action to protect supposed interests of the United States in the land was brought to the attention of the Department of Justice and the Secretary of the Navy. On March 2, 1921, the Commissioner of the General Land Office directed the register and receiver and the chief of the field division to take prompt action to determine by proper proceedings whether the land was known to be mineral at the date of the approval of the survey. The advisability of protecting the supposed interests of the Government, pending that determination, by an application for a receiver and an injunction, was considered by the several departments. That course was deemed inadvisable. Conference with representatives of the company resulted in an agreement that it would endeavor to secure from the Department of the Interior an early hearing and determination with respect to the known mineral character of the land; that, until such determination, there should be no further development thereon; and that the Government would not take any action in court. Thereafter, on several days prior to May 26, 1921, Mr. Oscar Sutro, representing the Standard Oil Co., presented to Secretary Fall and the First Assistant Secretary a request for an early determination with respect to the title to section 36. On May 26 he filed with the Secretary the brief above referred to. On May 28, 1921, the Secretary gave the Attorney General and the Secretary of the Navy the notice of hearing above referred to.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, now that the Senator from Montana is on his feet I would like to ask him a question relating to a subject with which I know he has peculiar familiarity. Why is it that Fall is not brought to trial? I see it stated in the press quite frequently that it is because of the delicate state of his health, and statements to that effect, I think, have been made for at least a year past. Why is it that this flagitious malefactor, if he is what he is supposed to be, is dealt with in such a spirit of morbid tenderness as that?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, the circumstance to which the Senator from Maryland adverts is as disappointing to me as it could possibly be to him.

Mr. BRUCE. I should think it would be to the Senator more than to any other person, because of the splendid ability and untiring perseverance with which all the proceedings against these land thieves have been prosecuted.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I thank the Senator. My information about the matter—and it is not very exact or very recent—is to the effect that the court having fixed, tentatively, at least, a time for the trial of Mr. Fall, a certificate or an affidavit from his physician was sent on saying that it would be impossible for Fall to come.

It will be recalled that when he was called on the second occasion before the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys a similar representation was made to the committee, but the committee, being perhaps a little doubtful about the matter, appointed a commission of physicians, consisting of three eminent physicians of this city, to wait upon Mr. Fall, to ascertain what his condition was. They came and reported to the committee that he was able to appear, and he did appear, and refused to testify, as the Senator will remember. Possibly taking that as a precedent, I am told that the court here has appointed a physician to go and examine into the condition of the defendant, to ascertain whether he could come on now for trial.

Mr. BRUCE. I did not know that. If I had understood that I would not have asked the question.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. I would like to have the attention of the Senator from Maryland. I interrupt the Senator only because it may be that, rather indirectly, perhaps directly, I have a little information on the subject about which the Senator from Maryland made inquiry, and he having made his inquiry I feel it my duty to disclose to the Senator what I know about the matter.

I had a conversation just the other day with one of the Government attorneys, whose good faith can not be questioned, and I learned from him that there was a very good showing made in regard to Mr. Fall's health from physicians who have examined him, and, as I remember it now, who in some way testified. At any rate, I got the impression that the United States special attorneys were not negligent in the matter, that they were crowding it, but they themselves were rather convinced that the physicians were probably right in stating that it would be dangerous for Mr. Fall to come from the climate in which he now is to this city, particularly at this time of the year, but that later in the year, perhaps in the spring or in the early summer months, the objection would not lie.

I regret, of course, that the case has been so delayed, but as far as I have been able to get any information I am rather inclined to believe that nobody is to be blamed; that the attorneys have acted in good faith.

Mr. BRUCE. I thank the Senator.

PETER SHAPP

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, I desire to report favorably from the Committee on Indian Affairs the bill (S. 4927) for the relief of Peter Shapp, and I submit a report (No. 1402) thereon.

The report on this bill being unanimous, and there being no objection to it, I ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. CURTIS. Let it be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will read the bill.

The legislative clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to pay to Peter Shapp $1,245.02, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for his shares in per capita payments made to the Western Miami Tribe of Indians in the years 1889 and 1891, which shares were erroneously paid to another Indian of the same name.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the bill?

There being on objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LAND AT MANCHESTER, N. H.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The calendar under rule 8 is in order.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, there are only five minutes between now and 2 o'clock, when the morning hour will close. obviously we could not make much progress on the calendar in that time. There are two bills on the calendar which are not of very great importance nationally, but of importance to the Post Office Department in the prosecution of their work. One of them is a bill in which the junior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. KEYES] is interested, and the other one in which the junior Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER] is interested. We could pass them in a moment or two, and I ask unanimous consent that we proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 4739) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to sell certain government-owned land at Manchester, N. H.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. BRUCE. I will unite in the request provided there is to be no discussion.

Mr. KING. There are only five minutes left before 2 o'clock, and those two bills can be passed in that time.

Mr. BRUCE. Very well.

Mr. McKELLAR. Let the bill be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will read the bill.

The bill was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and empowered, in his discretion, to sell to the New Hampshire Fire Insurance Co., for an amount not less than $20,000, the easterly 25 feet of the Government-owned site at Manchester, N. H., at such time and upon such terms as he may deem to be to the best interests of the United States, and to convey such property to the purchaser thereof by the usual quit-claim deed, the proceeds of such sale to be deposited in the Treasury as a miscellaneous receipt.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to immediate consideration?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RAPID TRANSIT RAILWAY IN NEW YORK

Mr. WAGNER. I ask the Senate to proceed to consideration of the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 171) granting the consent of Congress to the city of New York to enter upon certain United States property for the purpose of constructing a rapid transit railway.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

The joint resolution had been reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds with an amendment, on page 2, line 5, to strike out the words "for a distance of 40 feet; thence westerly on a line at right angles to the westerly wall of the Subtreasury Building to the westerly side of the areaway coping, a distance of approximately 5 feet, or to such other line as may actually form the westerly or Nassau Street boundary of the property of the United States; thence southerly along the westerly side of the areaway coping or along such other line as may actually form the westerly or Nassau Street boundary of the property of the United States for a distance of approximately 40 feet to the southerly boundary of the United States property; thence approximately 5 feet easterly along the southern boundary of the property of the United States to the point of beginning; and to permanently occupy, with a portion of the subway and/or sewer to be constructed in Nassau Street, New York City, the space below the level of the floor of the areaway within the limits described above," and to insert in lieu thereof "beginning at the southwest corner of the subtreasury site, being the intersection of the northerly line of Wall Street with the easterly line of Nassau Street, running thence northwardly with the line of Nassau Street along the westwardly side of the subtreasury area coping a distance of 40 feet to a point in the line of Nassau Street; thence in an eastwardly direction approximately 5.17 feet to the westwardly wall of the Subtreasury Building; thence in a southwardly direction with the westwardly line of the Subtreasury Building a distance of 40 feet to a point in the north line of Wall Street; thence with the north line of Wall Street along the southerly side of the subtreasury area coping a distance of 5.17 feet to the point or place of beginning," so as to make the joint resolution read:

Resolved, etc., That the consent of Congress is hereby granted to the city of New York to enter upon, for the purpose of constructing a rapid-transit railway, any and all property of the United States situated within the area described as follows:

Beginning at a point on Wall Street in the city of New York on the southern boundary of the property belonging to the United States and occupied wholly or partly by the Subtreasury Building, said point lying either at the southwest corner of the Subtreasury Building or in a southerly direction therefrom on a line in prolongation of the westerly wall of the Subtreasury Building and extending thence northerly along the westerly wall of the Subtreasury Building, or along a line in prolongation thereof, beginning at the southwest corner of the subtreasury site, being the intersection of the northerly line of Wall Street with the easterly line of Nassau Street, running thence northwardly with the line of Nassau Street along the westwardly side of the subtreasury area coping a distance of 40 feet to a point in the line of Nassau Street; thence in an eastwardly direction approximately 5.17 feet to the westwardly wall of the Subtreasury Building; thence in a southwardly direction with the westwardly line of the Subtreasury Building a distance of 40 feet to a point in the north line of Wall Street; thence with the north line of Wall street along the southerly side of the subtreasury area coping a distance of 5.17 feet to the point or place of beginning.

The subway structure, within the space hereinbefore described, shall be designed and constructed by the city of New York to carry the highest building that could be constructed on this property of the United States in accordance with the New York Building Code, and in default thereof the authority hereby granted shall cease and be null and void.

Mr. CURTIS. Has the department passed upon this measure?

Mr. WAGNER. The department is in favor of the legislation.

Mr. CURTIS. I have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

THE CALENDAR

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I was about to move to go into executive session, but a number of Senators have urged that we spend an hour on the calendar. I have no objection to that myself.

Mr. CURTIS. I ask unanimous consent, then, that with the consent of the Senator from Maine the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside and that we proceed with unobjected bills on the calendar until 3 o'clock.

Mr. HALE. That is, for one hour?

Mr. CURTIS. For one hour.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Morning business is closed, and the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. A bill (H. R. 11526) to authorize the construction of certain naval vessels, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the unfinished business is temporarily laid aside, and the clerk will report the first bill on the calendar.

The bill (S. 2787) providing for the appointment of governors of the non-Christian Provinces in the Philippine Islands by the Governor General without the consent of the Philippine Senate was announced as first in order on the calendar.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, this is an unusual proceeding. Senators ought to have an opportunity to be here to object to these bills, and as no Senator has been informed that we would proceed to the consideration of the calendar, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Fletcher	McMaster	Shipstead
Barkley	Frazier	McNary	Shortridge
Bayard	George	Mayfield	Simmons
Bingham	Gerry	Metcalf	Steck
Blaine	Glass	Moses	Steiwer
Blease	Glenn	Neely	Stephens

Brookhart	Gould	Norris	Thomas, Idaho
Broussard	Greene	Nye	Thomas, Okla.
Bruce	Hale	Oddie	Trammell
Capper	Harris	Overman	Tydings
Caraway	Hastings	Phipps	Vandenberg
Copeland	Hayden	Pine	Wagner
Couzens	Heflin	Ransdell	Walsh, Mass.

Deneen	Kendrick	Robinson, Ark.	Waterman
Dill	Keyes	Robinson, Ind.	Watson
Edge	King	Sackett	Wheeler
Edwards	La Follette	Schall
Fess	McKellar	Sheppard

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FESS in the chair). My colleague the junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] is absent from the Chamber on important business.

Eighty-two Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present. The clerk will call the first bill on the calendar.

RECOMMITMENT OF BILLS

The bill (S. 2787) providing for the appointment of governors of the non-Christian Provinces in the Philippine Islands by the Governor General without the consent of the Philippine Senate was announced as first in order.

Mr. KING. I object. Let the bill go over.

Mr. BINGHAM. Will the Senator kindly withhold his objection for a moment?

Mr. KING. Very well.

Mr. BINGHAM. Due to various new measures which have been introduced in the Philippine Legislature and the present state of affairs in the island it has seemed wise to some of us to have the two bills regarding the Philippine Islands now on the calendar, calendar Nos. 226 and 396, sent back to the committee. I therefore ask unanimous consent that the two bills may be taken from the calendar and referred back to the Committee on Territories and Insular Possessions for further consideration.

Mr. KING. May I inquire if the two measures comprise all the measures dealing with the Philippine Archipelago?

Mr. BINGHAM. My impression is that they do.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, pending the request may I ask if the Senator expects the committee to consider amendments to the bill or to report other bills? Has any policy been determined upon?

Mr. BINGHAM. The committee have not met. I am doing this on my own responsibility. I ask that the two measures be sent back to the committee for further consideration.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I have no objection to the request.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There being no objection, the bill (S. 2787) providing for the appointment of governors of the non-Christian Provinces in the Philippine Islands by the Governor General without the consent of the Philippine Senate and the bill (S. 2292) providing for the employment of certain civilian assistants in the office of the Governor General of the Philippine Islands, and fixing salaries of certain officials, will be taken from the calendar and referred back to the Committee on Territories and Insular Possessions.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS PASSED OVER

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 1) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States prohibiting war was announced as next in order.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, I would like to call attention to the fact that the proposed constitutional amendment seems to have quite an important bearing on the Kellogg peace pact.

It provides by section 1 that—

> War for any purpose shall be illegal, and neither the United States nor any State, Territory, association, or person subject to its jurisdiction shall prepare for, declare, engage in, or carry on war or other armed conflict—

And so forth.

It is perfectly obvious that even wars of self-defense are not exempted from the operation of the proposed constitutional amendment, which, laterally construed, I think is the effect of the Kellogg peace pact.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, let the joint resolution go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. On objection of the senior Senator from Kansas, the joint resolution will go over.

The bill (S. 1414) for the prevention and removal of obstructions and burdens upon interstate commerce in cottonseed oil by regulating transactions on future exchanges, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. COPELAND. The Senator from Texas [Mr. MAYFIELD] is not present. I ask that the bill may go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 1728) placing service postmasters in the classified service was announced as next in order.

Mr. BLEASE. Over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 1266) to create in the Bureau of Labor Statistics of the Department of Labor a division of safety was announced as next in order.

Mr. BAYARD. Over.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, I did not hear who objected. May I ask the Senator to withhold his objection just for one moment? I have not heard from any quarter any objection to the passage of the bill. From every humanitarian standpoint, from every economical standpoint, it is considered a wise measure.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, my reasons for opposing the measure were given to the Senate at the last session. I think it is an improper bill, and inasmuch as I still hold that view I shall exercise my right to object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. On objection, the bill goes over.

The bill (S. 759) to give the Supreme Court of the United States authority to make and publish rules in common-law actions was announced as next in order.

Mr. DENEEN. Over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 2864) to establish the standard of weights and measures for the following wheat-mill, rye-mill, and corn-mill products, namely, flours, semolina, hominy, grits, and meals, and all commercial feeding stuffs, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. CURTIS. I agreed with the junior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. TYSON] that the bill should go over in his absence.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 1093) to prevent the sale of cotton and grain in future markets was announced as next in order.

Mr. BRUCE. Over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 57) requesting the President to immediately withdraw the armed forces of the United States from Nicaragua was announced as next in order.

Mr. CURTIS. Let the joint resolution go over.

Mr. KING. I ask that the joint resolution go over. However, I want the RECORD to show that it is not because of antagonism to the measure. There is an adverse report, and in view of that fact I think the Senator from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] ought to be here when action is taken upon it.

LAND OFFICES IN ALASKA

The bill (S. 2532) to provide for the designation of clerks or employees of the Department of the Interior to serve as registers and receivers in the land offices in Alaska was announced as next in order.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Over.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I am not a member of the Committee on Territories and Insular Possessions. I do not know what the basis of the objection of the Senator from Wisconsin may be. My impression is that the reason for the measure grows out of the peculiar conditions in Alaska, because it is impossible to get anyone to take that office alone.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, my information is that there is considerable protest from people living in the Territory against the abolition of those land offices. Therefore I ask that the bill may go over until I have time to make a further investigation.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, it is proper to point out that the bill is a very unusual piece of legislation. It authorizes the designation of clerks in a department in Washington to serve as registers and receivers of the land offices in Alaska. It would require very extraordinary conditions to justify such a piece of legislation, in my judgment.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, when the matter was submitted to the committee there was no objection raised against it. It appears now from what the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] said that the people of Alaska are objecting. It seems to me that they ought to be heard, and therefore I ask that the bill may be taken from the calendar and referred back to the Committee on Territories and Insular Possessions.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the bill will be recommitted to the Committee on Territories and Insular Possessions.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS PASSED OVER

Mr. PHIPPS. Over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution goes over under objection.

Mr. JONES. Over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 1729) extending the classified civil service to include postmasters of the third class, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Over.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, I move that the bill be taken up for consideration.

Mr. CURTIS. I have no objection to taking up the bill, but that would be in violation of the unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. BRUCE. If it is, I shall not press the motion. I thought our form of procedure was such that we could move to take up a bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate is at present proceeding under a unanimous-consent agreement for the consideration of unobjected bills.

Mr. BRUCE. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 742) to provide for the establishment, operation, and maintenance of foreign trade zones in ports of entry of the United States to expedite and encourage foreign commerce, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I move that the bill be indefinitely postponed.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 117) authorizing an investigation and survey for a Nicaraguan canal was announced as next in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I think that the joint resolution had better go over, though I have no objection to its consideration when we may have, say, half an hour for that purpose.

Mr. EDGE. I understand that the Senator from Utah will be perfectly willing that I may make a motion for the consideration of the joint resolution, so that it may be taken up, if it can be discussed for, say, an hour?

Mr. KING. If that is done I will join with the Senator.

Mr. EDGE. That will be perfectly satisfactory to me.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint resolution, being objected to, goes over.

BILLS PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 2097) to provide for the protection of municipal watersheds within the national forests was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, my attention has been called to that bill by the senior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. BRATTON], who is not here; he has been unavoidably detained from the Senate; and I suggest that in his absence the bill be passed over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 3458) to create the reserve division of the War Department, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Let that bill go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. ODDIE. Let that bill be passed over.

STABILIZATION OF INDUSTRY IN PERIODS OF DEPRESSION

The bill (S. 2475) to create a prosperity reserve and to stabilize industry and employment by the expansion of public works during periods of unemployment and industrial depression was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I have two amendments which I am preparing to that bill. I did not anticipate that we should proceed to the consideration of the calendar this morning. I shall be prepared to present those amendments to the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES], the author of the bill, within the next day or two, and shall join with him later in asking for the consideration of the bill.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, I thought to promote prosperity was what they were going to do after the election on the 6th of November. Now do we have to enact legislation to bring about a condition of prosperity?

Mr. JONES. I am glad the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] feels the way he has expressed himself. I shall be glad to see the amendments intended to be proposed by him. I merely wish to say that this bill is recommended by the Department of Commerce and is in accordance with the views of the President. It was reported unanimously by the committee. There are, however, certain amendments which the committee made which it has informally agreed shall be receded from when the bill comes up for consideration.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Seriously, Mr. President, does the Senator from Washington think that the condition of business in the United States is such as to require congressional legislation to promote prosperity?

Mr. JONES. The bill provides that when prosperity is defective in a certain sense then action under it shall be taken.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Is the Senator from Washington anticipating such an event as the result of either the present or the next administration?

Mr. JONES. Or at any time in the future?

Mr. KING. I might suggest that we had better postpone action on this measure for about a year, when hard times will come.

Mr. JONES. The idea is to have legislation so that when hard times do come it will be available. Hard times might come when Congress should not be in session.

Mr. CARAWAY. I think we had better consider the bill immediately.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Being objected to, the bill will go over.

PUBLIC ROAD IN WIND RIVER INDIAN RESERVATION, WYO.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 2330) authorizing reconstruction and improvement of a public road in Wind River Indian Reservation, Wyo., which had been reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs with an amendment, on line 5, after the words "sum of," to strike out "$250,000" and insert "$150,000," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $150,000 for the reconstruction and improvement of the road running northwest from Milford across Wind River or Shoshone Indian Reservation, through Fort Washakie to the diversion dam in Wyoming, approximately 30 miles, and lying wholly within said Indian reservation: Provided, That the work on said road shall be jointly under the supervision and direction of the Bureau of Indian Affairs and the Bureau of Public Roads.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I see from the bill itself that the appropriation is to come from the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. KENDRICK. Mr. President, the appropriation included herein is to construct a highway for a distance of about 30 miles across the Shoshone Indian Reservation in Wyoming. The building of this road would connect two ends of 150 miles each, or 300 miles, of a Federal highway extending from Rawlins, Wyo., on the Union Pacific Railroad, to the Yellowstone Park. The absence of development on this piece of road practically prevents the efficient use of the greater part of the 150 miles of road from the Union Pacific to a point about 3 miles north of Lander, Wyo., and also the 150 miles of highway beginning at a point north of the reservation and extending to the Yellowstone Park. In other words, the entire investment in a long line of road is made more or less inoperative and but little worth while because of this gap in the road.

Among the reasons why the 30 miles have not been included in the program of construction are, first, that the State has allocated every dollar of its road funds and its Federal funds to highways in other parts of the State; second, the absence of taxable values across this Indian reservation and the already heavy burden of taxation renders it impossible for the county in which the road is located to assume the cost of building on the reservation. It is also true that the permanent construction of this road would furnish the Shoshone Indians greatly increased facilities for the transportation of their forage crops to market, and for that reason meet an unusually urgent need.

Under such circumstances it seems only consistent that some action should be taken to finish this short section in order that not only the people locally but the hundreds of tourists from outside the State might have the benefit of the long line of road already completed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

After a sinking fund, including the earnings thereof from investment or otherwise, sufficient for such amortization shall have been provided, such bridge shall thereafter be maintained and operated free of tolls, or the rates of toll shall thereafter be so adjusted as to provide a fund of not to exceed the amount necessary for the proper maintenance, repair, and operation of the bridge and its approaches under economical management. An accurate record of the cost of the bridge and its approaches, the expenditures for maintaining, repairing, and operating the same, and of the daily tolls collected, shall be kept and shall be available for the information of all persons interested.

Any person, firm, association, or corporation required by this act to furnish a report, and any officer, agent, or employee thereof who shall refuse or willfully neglect to furnish any of the information required by this act, or shall willfully give answers that are false or misleading, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be fined not less than $300 or more than $1,000 or imprisoned not more than one year, or both.

No publication shall be made by the Secretary of Agriculture whereby the data furnished by any particular establishment can be identified, nor shall the Secretary of Agriculture permit anyone other than the sworn employees of the Department of Agriculture to examine the individual reports.

SEC. 8. The act approved April 30, 1912, providing for the collection of tobacco statistics by the Bureau of the Census is hereby repealed.

SEC. 9. If any provision of this act is declared unconstitutional or the applicability thereof to any person or circumstance is held invalid, the validity of the remainder of the act and the applicability of such provisions to other persons and circumstances shall not be affected thereby.

Mr. JONES. Very well.

Mr. PHIPPS. I hope that bill may be taken up for serious consideration some time in the near future.

EQUALIZATION OF RANK OF CERTAIN ARMY AND NAVY OFFICERS

The bill (H. R. 9961) to equalize the rank of officers in positions of great responsibility in the Army and Navy was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, we have a number of bills here dealing with promotions of officers of the Army. I was wondering if it would not be better to consider them together.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, this is not of the same class as the other bills of that type. It merely gives temporary rank to the Chief of Staff so as to put him on a par with the Chief of Naval Operations. It is not a matter of very great importance, but it has been a sore spot in the Army for a great many years. Both the House and the Senate Committees on Military Affairs were unanimous in favor of the bill.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, does the Chief of Naval Operations now rank the Chief of Staff?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. In every case, no matter how much he is junior to him, or how long after the Chief of Staff he was appointed; and they ought to rank between themselves according to the dates of their appointments as such. That is all that the bill provides.

Mr. KING. Is it important to preserve parity as between officers of the Army and Navy and Reserve Corps?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Yes, Mr. President; it is. The services are of equal dignity, and it is not right that either of them should take advantage of the other.

Mr. KING. Might it not be better to reduce the naval officer down to a parity with the rank enjoyed by the Army officer—instead of stepping one up, to step the other down a little?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I should be perfectly satisfied with that; but the Congress in the past has promoted the Chief of Naval Operations and the commander of any battle fleet to the rank of admiral.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment, on page 1, line 10, after the words "dates of," to strike out "appointment as such" and insert "commission in the advanced rank held by them while serving as such and shall both take rank above all other officers on the active list of the Army and Navy," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That hereafter the Chief of Staff of the Army, while holding office as such, shall have the rank and title of general, and shall receive the pay and allowances of a major general, and in addition thereto, the personal money allowance prescribed by law for the officer of the Navy serving as Chief of Naval Operations. The Chief of Staff of the Army and the Chief of Naval Operations shall take rank between themselves according to dates of commission in the advanced rank held by them while serving as such and shall both take rank above all other officers on the active list of the Army and Navy.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

RETIREMENT OF ENLISTED MEN OF PHILIPPINE SCOUTS

The bill (S. 4640) to provide for the retirement of enlisted men of the Philippine Scouts, and for other purposes, was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That when an enlisted man of the Philippine Scouts shall have served 30 years either in the Army (including the Philippine Scouts), Navy, or Marine Corps, or in all, he shall, upon making application to the President, be placed upon the retired list, with 75 per cent of the pay and allowances he may then be in receipt of, and that said allowances shall be as follows: $6.35 per month in lieu of rations and clothing, and $4.15 per month in lieu of quarters, fuel, and light: Provided, That in computing the necessary 30 years' time all service in the Army (including the Philippine Scouts), Navy, and Marine Corps shall be credited.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I should like to have an explanation of the bill.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, this bill provides for the retirement of enlisted men of the Philippine Scouts who have served faithfully for 30 years or more. At this moment there is no such person living; but next November the oldest of the veterans of the Philippine Scouts will have reached the 30-year period. He is the only enlisted man in the United States Army who is denied retirement privileges. Those men have been constantly engaged in dangerous service since they first enlisted in the Army. In every respect the Philippine Scouts constitute an integral part of the United States Army. This is the only particular in which there is a difference, save that their pay is lower; consequently, their retirement pay will be much lower. It is estimated that this retirement privilege will cost the United States approximately $6,000 in 1930, and that that amount will increase, in all likelihood, so that by 1936 it will reach its maximum of about a quarter of a million dollars. I am quoting those figures from memory. The exact figures are given in the report.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PURCHASE OF LAND NEAR CAMP BULLIS, TEX.

The bill (H. R. 11071) providing for the purchase of 1,124 acres of land, more or less, in the vicinity of Camp Bullis, Tex., and authorizing an appropriation therefor, was announced as next in order.

Mr. JONES. Let that go over.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, will not the Senator withhold his objection for a moment until I can make an explanation of that bill?

Mr. JONES. Certainly.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I am glad to yield to the Senator from Texas.

Mr. SHEPPARD. It will be perfectly satisfactory to me for the chairman of the committee to explain the measure.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I beg the Senator's pardon. I knew the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK] was not here, and I did not notice that the Senator from Texas himself was here. I hope he will explain the bill.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I thank the chairman of the committee for his offer to cooperate, and I shall be glad to have his assistance.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I am glad to do so.

Mr. SHEPPARD. The object of the bill is to acquire a strip of land between two camps in Texas, and it consists of about 1,100 acres. Both the camps are used for artillery practice; and with the high-powered guns of to-day it is not possible to conduct that practice satisfactorily without firing across this land, which heretofore has been rented by the Government. The price is not excessive.

Mr. JONES. Is the land settled?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I do not have exact information in that regard at hand.

Mr. JONES. How many settlers are there on it?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I am unable to say exactly how many.

Mr. JONES. Is it divided into small farms and well settled up?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I am not accurately informed as to how thoroughly it is settled. It is certainly needed by the Government to connect Camps Stanley and Bullis for purposes of effective artillery practice.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. If the Senator will permit me, the land has been used as part of the reservation in the past under a rental arrangement. It is the desire now to get title to it for the Government. There has been some trouble about renewing the lease. It is a wedge in the middle of the reservation over which the artillery must fire. At present it is very sparsely occupied; otherwise, we could not get it for not more than $10 an acre. We will have condemnation proceedings if we can not get it at a satisfactory price.

Mr. JONES. I withdraw my objection.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS PASSED OVER

The bill (H. R. 1320) for the relief of James W. Pringle was announced as next in order.

Mr. BRUCE. Let that go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 2192) for the relief of Lemuel Simpson was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (H. R. 11859) for the relief of B. C. Miller was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let the bill be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the bill.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I should like to know what statute would be offended against if this man were permitted to withdraw this deposit without the consent of Congress.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will ask that this bill be passed over.

FEDERAL NARCOTIC FARMS

The bill (H. R. 13645) to establish two United States narcotic farms for the confinement and treatment of persons addicted to the use of habit-forming narcotic drugs who have been convicted of offenses against the United States, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that bill go over until we can have an opportunity to investigate it.

Mr. DENEEN. Mr. President, will the Senator withhold his objection for a moment?

Mr. KING. Yes.

Mr. DENEEN. This is a House bill. It authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Treasury and the Secretary of War to select two sites for narcotic farms. It also authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to make estimates as to their cost, the cost of the buildings to be erected thereon, and their cost of operation. In the House a very careful hearing was had in this matter, and the report states, on the first page, that the three penitentiaries at Atlanta, Leavenworth, and McNeil Island have a capacity for 3,778 persons, and that on April 1, 1928, there were 7,598 persons in those penitentiaries. There are among them 1,559 addicts of narcotic drugs. The purpose of the bill is to accumulate information upon which the next Congress may act intelligently.

Mr. KING. I do not understand exactly what the Senator means by "collecting information."

Mr. DENEEN. The selection of the sites, the estimate of the cost of the sites, the estimate of the cost of the buildings to be erected thereon, and the estimate of the cost of operation.

Mr. KING. I understand that; but the point that I am trying to get at is, Is it the purpose to erect additional penitentiaries?

Mr. DENEEN. To erect two to accommodate the inmates of penal institutions. We have already outgrown the capacity to take care of those who are punished under Federal law, and it is particularly important because of the fact that there are 1,559 addicts among them now.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, will the Senator let me interrupt him? I have not had an opportunity to read the bill; but, as I understand from the statement of the Senator, this bill does not contemplate the actual purchase of sites or the actual appropriations for constructing the buildings.

Mr. DENEEN. Not at all.

Mr. JONES. It simply provides for securing estimates to be submitted to Congress for further legislative action.

Mr. DENEEN. It authorizes these officials to recommend certain sites.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, has the bill the recommendation of the Department of Justice?

Mr. DENEEN. No; the bill has not been referred to any department for recommendation, as I understand.

Mr. KING. That is a matter that struck me as rather curious. The Department of Justice has to do with these penitentiaries. The Department of Justice controls them; and I was wondering why the matter now was taken from its hands and put into the hands of the Treasury Department, when the Department of Justice has the responsibility of caring for these people.

Mr. DENEEN. The bill contemplates the expenditure of money at present only for the purpose of selecting the sites, not for purchasing them, and an estimate of the cost.

Mr. KING. Let me ask the Senator a question. Does not the Senator believe that the department of the Government that has charge of the prisoners and is responsible for them would know more about the places where an additional penitentiary should be constructed than some other department of the Government?

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DENEEN. This bill was drafted in the House and passed by the House. I take it for granted that the Department of Justice was consulted.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me right in that connection? By section 2, page 2, of the bill, the Attorney General, the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Secretary of War are authorized and directed to select the sites, so that the Attorney General is included on the commission.

Mr. DENEEN. I omitted to state that the Attorney General is one of the officers empowered to select these sites.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. It does not appear to me why the Secretary of War is named.

Mr. McKELLAR. Probably the Secretary of the Treasury was named because he has charge of buildings generally.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Yes.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am in very hearty sympathy with the purpose of this bill, I will say to the Senator from Illinois; and, as far as I am concerned, I have no objection to it.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield? I assume that another reason why the Secretary of the Treasury was selected is because the United States Public Health Service comes under the Treasury Department; and, since this has to do with the medical phase as well as the custodial care of these persons, it would naturally go to the department which has to do with matters relating to health.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

TERMS OF COURT IN VERMONT

The bill (S. 3590) to amend section 110 of the Judicial Code was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, let the bill be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the bill.

The legislative clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted etc., That section 110 of the Judicial Code (being sec. 191, title 28, of the United States Code) is hereby amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 191. (Judicial Code, sec. 110, amended.)—Vermont: The State of Vermont shall constitute one judicial district to be known as the district of Vermont. Terms of the district court shall be held at Burlington on the second Tuesday in February, at Windsor on the second Tuesday in May, at Rutland on the second Tuesday in October, and at Brattleboro on the second Tuesday in December. Any stated term may, when adjourned, be adjourned to meet at any of the other stated places or at Montpelier or Newport. (Rev. Stat., sec. 531; March 3, 1911, ch. 231, sec. 110; 36 Stat. 1127; February 1, 1912, ch. 26, 37 Stat. 58.)

Mr. DALE. Mr. President, I should like to say in connection with this bill that it changes the code only in this respect: The terms of the Federal court in Vermont now are held on the fourth, third, first, and third Tuesdays, respectively, in February, May, October, and December.

Mr. McKELLAR. Does this bill apply only to Vermont or to the entire country?

Mr. DALE. Only to the State of Vermont. Those dates conflict with the dates of convening of the supreme court and the superior court; and it is proposed to change the dates of convening to the first Tuesday of each of the months I have named. The Federal judge, the district attorney, and the bar generally request this change simply as a matter of convenience in the holding of court, so that the terms of court will not conflict with each other.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES OFFICE BUILDING

The bill (H. R. 12897) to provide for the acquisition of a site and the construction thereon of a fireproof office building or buildings for the House of Representatives was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DEFINITION OF DEPENDENT CHILD OR CHILDREN

The bill (H. R. 12449) to define the terms "child" and "children" as used in the acts of May 18, 1920, and June 10, 1922, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with amendments.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, a word of explanation about this bill. It has been discovered that there were adoptions by officers of the Navy of children who are almost as old as the officers themselves, the apparent purpose being to increase the dependency allowances paid to officers in that situation. The Comptroller General very promptly and very properly refused to credit the accounts of those officers under those circumstances. One or two of the cases have gone to the court.

This bill recognizes the correctness of the Comptroller General's ruling in requiring a bona fide dependency, but it also corrects that ruling and limits it so as not to deny dependency relief where there is a bona fide adoption of a child. A bona fide adopted child is treated as a dependent in just the same way that a natural child is. That is all this bill would do.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report the first amendment of the committee.

The amendments were, on page 1, line 10, to strike out the words "natural children" and to insert in lieu thereof the words "children, stepchildren"; and on the same page, line 11, to strike out the word "children" and to insert the words "children, where such legitimate children, stepchildren, or adopted children are in fact dependent upon the person claiming dependency allowance," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the words "child" and "children" as used in section 12 of the act approved May 18, 1920 (41 Stat. 604), and in section 4 of the act approved June 10, 1922 (42 Stat. 627), and in section 12 of the act approved June 10, 1922 (42 Stat. 631), as amended by the act approved June 1, 1926 (44 Stat. 680), shall be held to include, legitimate children, stepchildren, and adopted children, where such legitimate children, stepchildren, or adopted children are in fact dependent upon the person claiming dependency allowance.

Mr. McKELLAR. May I ask the Senator as to the words "or adopted children are in fact dependent upon the person claiming the dependency allowance." Would that prevent older persons from being adopted if they were actually dependent upon the official?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. There is a distinct age limit fixed in the present law. The dependency must exist as a matter of fact. The child who is adopted must in fact be supported out of the earnings of the officer.

Mr. McKELLAR. There is an age limit in the law as it is now?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Yes; with certain exceptions as to permanently crippled persons, and matters of that sort.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

MISSOURI RIVER BRIDGE, NEBRASKA

The bill (H. R. 13826) authorizing the Interstate Bridge Co., its successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Missouri River at or near Union, Nebr., was announced as next in order.

Mr. BLEASE. Mr. President, I would like to ask whether that bridge is to be built by individuals who are to be perpetually permitted to charge people crossing the bridge. I notice on the calendar several bridge bills, and down in my section I have noted that some people build bridges and make fortunes out of them, and just continue to charge tolls. I would like to know if this is to be a perpetual right.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I may say to the Senator that there has been a general form adopted for these bridge bills for the committees both of the House and the Senate to follow. We have a subcommittee of the Committee on Commerce, which deals with these measures and sees that they conform to that form. They report directly to the Senate. I have a very distinct recollection that there is a condition in that form under which, where the bridge is constructed by private parties, after a certain period of time the cost of the bridge shall be amortized, and thereafter it becomes a free bridge, or, at any rate, there is a condition in the bill under which the State or the county or the municipality can take the bridge over, and the basis of cost is prescribed in the law itself. I think that the interests of the public are as fully protected as we can protect them by law, because these forms were gone into very carefully by both committees of the House and the Senate.

Mr. McKELLAR. That condition is to be found in section 5 of the measure.

Mr. BLEASE. In some places there are ferries, and, of course, they are inconvenient, and it is much more convenient to use a bridge, but certain people get permission to build a bridge on a public road that belongs to the people and simply hold the bridge as long as time lasts, and they and their heirs and successors charge the public for crossing the bridge. I think there should be some provision somewhere that at some time such bridges should either be made free bridges or there should be some means by which the toll rate could be reduced.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state that the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DALE], who reported the bill, has just come into the Chamber, and will answer the question of the Senator from South Carolina if he will repeat it.

Mr. COPELAND. While the Senator from Vermont is looking the matter up, may I say that this bill provides in section 4 that it may be taken over by "the State of Nebraska, the State of Iowa, any public agency or political subdivision of either of such States," and so on, and it has been the policy of the Committee on Commerce, as the chairman of the committee has said, ever since I have been a member of it, that no bill should be reported unless it had in it that proviso, and that under certain conditions the bridge might be taken over.

Mr. McKELLAR. An amortization fund is provided for in section 5, and it is further provided that at the end of 20 years it shall become a free bridge.

Mr. JONES. It is further provided that at any time the Secretary of War considers the tolls unreasonable, he can reduce them to a reasonable figure.

Mr. BLEASE. I do not object, but I wanted to have the facts understood.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

OHIO RIVER BRIDGE, WEST VIRGINIA

The bill (S. 4778) authorizing the Moundsville Bridge Co. to construct a bridge across the Ohio River from a point at or near the city of Moundsville, Marshall County, W. Va., to a point opposite in Belmont County, Ohio, was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in order to facilitate interstate commerce, improve the postal service, and provide for military and other purposes, the Moundsville Bridge Co., its successors and assigns, be, and is hereby, authorized to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the Ohio River, at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, at or near the city of Moundsville, W. Va., in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906, and subject to the conditions and limitations contained in this act.

SEC. 2. There is hereby conferred upon the Moundsville Bridge Co., its successors and assigns, all such rights and powers to enter upon lands and to acquire, condemn, occupy, possess, and use real estate and other property needed for the location, contruction, operation, and maintenance of such bridge and its approaches as are possessed by railroad corporations for railroad purposes or by bridge corporations for bridge purposes in the State in which such real estate or other property is situated, upon making just compensation therefor, to be ascertained and paid according to the laws of such State, and the proceedings therefor shall be the same as in the condemnation or expropriation of property for public purposes in such State.

SEC. 3. The said Moundsville Bridge Co., its successors and assigns, is hereby authorized to fix and charge tolls for transit over such bridge, and the rates of toll so fixed shall be the legal rates until changed by the Secretary of War under the authority contained in the act of March 23, 1906.

SEC. 4. After the completion of such bridge, as determined by the Secretary of War, either the State of West Virginia, the State of Ohio, any public agency or political subdivision of either of such States, within or adjoining which any part of such bridge is located, or any two or more of them jointly, may at any time acquire and take over all right, title, and interest in such bridge and its approaches, and any interest in real property necessary therefor, by purchase or by condemnation or expropriation, in accordance with the laws of either of such States governing the acquisition of private property for public purposes by condemnation or expropriation. If at any time after the expiration of 20 years after the completion of such bridge the same is acquired by condemnation or expropriation, the amount of damages or compensation to be allowed shall not include good will, going value, or prospective revenues or profits but shall be limited to the sum of (1) the actual cost of constructing such bridge and its approaches, less a reasonable deduction for actual depreciation in value; (2) the actual cost of acquiring such interests in real property; (3) actual financing and promotion costs, not to exceed 10 per cent of the sum of the cost of constructing the bridge and its approaches and acquiring such interests in real property; and (4) actual expenditures for necessary improvements.

SEC. 5. If such bridge shall at any time be taken over or acquired by the States or public agencies or political subdivisions thereof, or by either of them, as provided in section 4 of this act, and if tolls are thereafter charged for the use thereof, the rates of toll shall be so adjusted as to provide a fund sufficient to pay for the reasonable cost of maintaining, repairing, and operating the bridge and its approaches under economical management, and to provide a sinking fund sufficient to amortize the amount paid therefor, including reasonable interest and financing cost, as soon as possible under reasonable charges, but within a period of not to exceed 20 years from the date of acquiring the same. After a sinking fund sufficient for such amortization shall have been so provided, such bridge shall thereafter be maintained and operated free of tolls, or the rates of toll shall thereafter be so adjusted as to provide a fund of not to exceed the amount neccessary for the proper maintenance, repair, and operation of the bridge and its approaches under economical management. An accurate record of the amount paid for acquiring the bridge and its approaches, the actual expenditures for maintaining, repairing, and operating the same, and of the daily tolls collected, shall be kept and shall be available for the information of all persons interested.

SEC. 6. The said Moundsville Bridge Co., its successors and assigns, shall within 90 days after the completion of such bridge file with the Secretary of War, and with the highway departments of the States of West Virginia and Ohio, a sworn itemized statement showing the actual original cost of constructing the bridge and its approaches, the actual cost of acquiring any interest in real property necessary therefor, and the actual financing and promotion costs. The Secretary of War may, and upon request of the highway department of either of such States shall, at any time within three years after the completion of such bridge, investigate such costs and determine the accuracy and the reasonableness of the costs alleged in the statement of costs so filed, and shall make a finding of the actual and reasonable costs of constructing, financing, and promoting such bridge. For the purpose of such investigation the said Moundsville Bridge Co., its successors and assigns, shall make available all of its records in connection with the construction, financing, and promotion thereof. The findings of the Secretary of War as to the reasonable costs of the construction, financing, and promotion of the bridge shall be conclusive for the purposes mentioned in section 4 of this act, subject only to review in a court of equity for fraud or gross mistake.

SEC. 7. The right to sell, assign, transfer, and mortgage all the rights, powers, and privileges conferred by this act is hereby granted to the Moundsville Bridge Co., its successors and assigns, and any corporation to which or any person to whom such rights, powers, and privileges may be sold, assigned, or transferred, or who shall acquire the same by mortgage foreclosure or otherwise, is hereby authorized and empowered to exercise the same as fully as though conferred herein directly upon such corporation or person.

SEC. 8. The right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill authorizing the Moundsville Bridge Co. to construct a bridge across the Ohio River at or near the city of Moundsville, W. Va."

OHIO RIVER BRIDGE, OHIO

The bill had been reported by the Committee on Commerce with amendments, on page 1, line 3, to strike out the word "the," and insert the word "The"; on line 4, to strike out the word "Saint," and to insert in lieu thereof "St."; on line 8, after the word "existing," to insert the word "railroad"; on page 2, line 3, after the numerals "1906" and the comma, to insert the words "other than those requiring the approval of plans by the Chief of Engineers and the Secretary of War before the bridge is commenced"; on page 2, line 6, to insert a new section, as follows:

SEC. 2. The right to sell, assign, transfer, and mortgage all the rights, powers, and privileges conferred by this act is hereby granted to the Pittsburgh, Cincinnati, Chicago & St. Louis Railroad Co., its successors and assigns, and any corporation to which, or any person to whom, such rights, powers, and privileges may be sold, assigned, or transferred, or who shall acquire the same by mortgage foreclosure, or otherwise, is hereby authorized to exercise the same as fully as though conferred herein directly upon such corporation or person.

On page 2, line 16, to strike out "2," and insert in lieu thereof "3," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the consent of Congress is hereby granted to The Pittsburgh, Cincinnati, Chicago & St. Louis Railroad Co., a corporation duly organized under the general laws of the States of Pennsylvania, West Virginia, Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, its successors and assigns, to maintain and operate its existing railroad bridge and approaches thereto over the Ohio River at Steubenville, Ohio, in accordance with the provisions of an act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906, other than those requiring the approval of plans by the Chief of Engineers and the Secretary of War before the bridge is commenced.

SEC. 3. The right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to legalize the existing railroad bridge across the Ohio River at Steubenville, Ohio."

POTOMAC RIVER BRIDGE

The bill (S. 4721) to extend the time for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge across the Potomac River and to authorize the use of certain Government land was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Commerce with amendments on page 1, line 7, after the word "act," to strike out the words "granting the consent of Congress to" and to insert the word "authorizing"; on line 8, after the word "Company" and the comma, to insert the words "its successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate"; on line 9, to strike out the words "to construct"; on line 10, after the word "River," to insert the words "at or near the Great Falls"; on page 2, line 7, after the word "bridge," to strike out the words "as authorized by section 1 of this act" and to insert the words "upon such terms and conditions as the Secretary of War may deem equitable and fair to the public"; on line 11, to strike out the words "This act shall be in force from its passage" and to insert the words "That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the time for commencing and the time for completing the construction of a bridge authorized by the act of Congress approved April 21, 1928, to be built across the Potomac River by the Great Falls Bridge Co., entitled "An act authorizing the Great Falls Bridge Co., its successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Potomac River at or near the Great Falls" are hereby extended one and three years, respectively, from the date of the approval hereof.

SEC. 2. In constructing the said bridge the said company is authorized by and with the approval of the Secretary of War, to use and occupy such Government-owned land located at or near Great Falls as is necessary to carry to completion the construction of said bridge upon such terms and conditions as the Secretary of War may deem equitable and fair to the public.

SEC. 3. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, let me understand that amendment about the site. My recollection is that the committee has not permitted the assignments where the grant to construct the bridge is to a State or a county or a municipality, because that might enable the county or the State or the municipality to turn it over to private parties. The conditions for private parties are different from those to States or counties. I will ask the clerk to report that amendment again.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report the amendment.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 1, line 8, after the word "company," to insert the words "its successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate," and to strike out the words "to construct."

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I suggest that the bill go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will go over.

Mr. JONES subsequently said: Mr. President, I would like to ask which bill it was that went over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Order of Business 1397, Senate bill 4721.

Mr. JONES. I will say to the Senator from Arkansas that that is a different bill from the one I thought we had reached on the calendar. That is a bill to extend the time for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge across the Potomac River, and authorizing the use of certain Government land.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I have no objection to its consideration if the chairman of the committee has his mind clear on the matter now.

Mr. JONES. It is not a grant, as I understand it, to a municipality or to a State.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendments.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FOX RIVER BRIDGE, ILLINOIS

The bill (S. 4744) granting the consent of Congress to the city of Aurora, State of Illinois, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Fox River within the city of Aurora, State of Illinois, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Commerce with amendments, on page 1, line 7, after the word "navigation" and the comma, to strike out the words "in substantially a direct line connecting" and insert in lieu thereof the words "at or near"; on line 8, after the word "Avenue," to strike out the words "on the west side of the river with North Avenue on the east side of the river," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the consent of Congress is hereby granted to the city of Aurora, State of Illinois, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the Fox River in said city, at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, at or near North Avenue, in accordance with the provisions of an act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. The right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FOX RIVER BRIDGE, ILLINOIS

The bill (S. 4745) granting the consent of Congress to the city of Aurora, State of Illinois, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Fox River within the city of Aurora, State of Illinois, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Commerce with amendments, on page 1, line 6, after the word "city" and the comma, to strike out all down to and including the word "River" in line 3 on page 2, and to insert in lieu thereof the words "at a point suitable to the interests of navigation at or near New York Street," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the consent of Congress is hereby granted to the city of Aurora, State of Illinois, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the Fox River in said city, at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, at or near New York Street in accordance with the provisions of an act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. The right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, where is this bill on the calendar?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is order of business 1399.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. That appears to be the same as order of business 1398. There is a little difference in the language, but the legal construction of them is probably the same.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Can the Senator from Illinois give some light on that?

Mr. DENEEN. Senate bill 4744 is for the construction of a bridge across the Fox River. I have not had an opportunity to read the whole bill, but there are two different views as to where the bridge should go. The measures apply to the same city and to the same river.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendments.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, has the time fixed in the unanimous-consent agreement been concluded?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be in one minute.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, there are but a few other bills on the calendar, and I suggest that consent be obtained to complete the call of the calendar. Perhaps it could be completed in 10 minutes.

Mr. CURTIS. I ask unanimous consent that we go to the end of the calendar in the consideration of unobjected bills.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

MISSISSIPPI RIVER BRIDGE, ILLINOIS

The bill (S. 4787) to revive and reenact the act entitled "An act granting the consent of Congress to the State of Illinois and the State of Iowa, or either of them, to construct a bridge across the Mississippi River, connecting the county of Carroll, Ill., and the county of Jackson, Iowa," approved May 26, 1924, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

ALFRED ST. DENNIS

The bill (H. R. 3041) for the relief of Alfred St. Dennis was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Over.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, will the Senator withhold his objection for a moment?

Mr. KING. I objected because the record shows that the man was a deserter.

Mr. BROOKHART. I want to call the attention of the Senator to the fact that he is not on the record as a deserter. In this case the muster-out roll itself shows that he was absent, sick, at the time of the mustering out of his company, and that under those conditions he could not be in reality a deserter. I think there is no doubt about the bill and that it ought to pass.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Iowa whether the bill received the approval of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED], chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs?

Mr. BROOKHART. I think so. However, that Senator is present and can speak for himself.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. What was the inquiry?

Mr. BRUCE. I asked the Senator from Iowa whether the bill had received the approval of the Senator from Pennsylvania as chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Yes. It was shown that the man had pneumonia, that he was taken to the hospital sick, that he was delirious when he got to his home, and that when he finally got well so that he could report to his regiment, the war was over and there was no such regiment.

Mr. BROOKHART. It appears on the muster-out roll that he was absent sick.

Mr. KING. Robert C. Davis, The Adjutant General, states in a letter appearing in the report:

> Upon this presentation of the case, application for removal of the charge of desertion has been repeatedly denied, and now stands denied, for the reason that the soldier did not serve until May 1, 1865, and that it has not been satisfactorily established that he was prevented from completing his term of enlistment.

Mr. BROOKHART. That ruling was made in the War Department notwithstanding the fact that the muster-out roll showed that he was absent sick. I think they were wrong in their ruling, but we can not correct it except by this legislation.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. If the Senator will look at the bottom of the first page of the report, he will see that it is officially stated that the muster-out roll of July 30, 1865, which, of course, is the last roll of the regiment, shows this soldier as having been absent sick from May 6, 1864, so that he was officially shown at the time to be absent sick and his absence was explained in that way. I can not understand why they did not hold that that was enough to satisfy the amnesty act.

Mr. KING. I withdraw my objection.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and was read, as follows:

> Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of any laws conferring rights, privileges, and benefits upon honorably discharged soldiers, Alfred St. Dennis, who was a member of Company E, Fifty-seventh Regiment Massachusetts Volunteer Infantry, Civil War, shall hereafter be held and considered to have been honorably discharged from the military service of the United States as a private of that organization on the 6th day of May, 1864: Provided, That no bounty, back pay, pension, or allowance shall be held to have accrued prior to the passage of this act.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WILLIAM LENTZ

The bill (H. R. 8798) for the relief of William Lentz was considered as in Committee of the Whole and was read, as follows:

> Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of the pension laws and the laws conferring rights, privileges, and benefits upon honorably discharged soldiers, William Lentz, formerly a member of Company E, One hundred and fifty-eighth Regiment Indiana Volunteer Infantry, war with Spain; Company M, Nineteenth Regiment United States Infantry; and who served honorably in the World War, shall be held and considered to have been honorably discharged from the military service of the United States as a member of Company M, Nineteenth Regiment United States Infantry.
> SEC. 2. No back pay, bounty, or other emoluments shall accrue prior to the passage of this act.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, I would like an explanation of the bill.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, in this case the soldier served through the Spanish War and was given an honorable discharge. He deserted in time of peace and then served again through the World War and was honorably discharged. We felt that his record justified the approval and passage of the bill.

Mr. BRUCE. I have no objection.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MILITARY RESERVATION, MONTEREY, CALIF.

The bill (H. R. 13033) authorizing the Secretary of War to convey certain portions of the military reservation at Monterey, Calif., to the city of Monterey, Calif., for the extension of Alvarado Street was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and was read, as follows:

> Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized to convey to the city of Monterey, Calif., by suitable instrument, an easement for a right of way over that portion of the military reservation at Monterey, Calif., particularly described, as follows, to wit:
> Beginning at a point on the south line of the United States Military Reservation, Monterey, Monterey County, Calif., which bears north 80° east, 75.16 feet distant from the point of intersection of said line of said reservation with the east line of Lighthouse Road (sometimes called Lighthouse Avenue), and running thence north 80° east 62.13 feet to a point which is 25 feet distant westerly from the center line of the Southern Pacific Railroad track; thence northerly on a curve of 630 feet radius, curving to the right (long chord, north 5° 17½′ west 346.77 feet) 351.3 feet to a point on the east line of said Lighthouse Road and 20 feet distant west from the center line of said Southern Pacific Railroad track, thence south 18° 35½′ west, along the east line of Lighthouse Road, 283 feet; thence south 19° 41′ east 138.6 feet to the point of beginning, subject to such conditions, restrictions, and reservations as the Secretary of War may impose for the protection of the reservation and subject to a perpetual right of way over said land for the uses of any department of the Government of the United States.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILL PASSED OVER

The bill (H. R. 14800) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers, sailors, and marines of the Civil War, and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers, sailors, and marines of said war, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. That is a very long bill and it will take some time to consider it. I suggest that it go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. On objection, the bill will be passed over.

AUGUST J. MACK

The bill (H. R. 10472) to authorize the appointment of Master Sergt. August J. Mack as a warrant officer, United States Army, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I would like to ask the chairman the purpose of the legislation?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. The officer was in China and was authorized by existing law to have been appointed a warrant officer. His application was put in the mail promptly, but by delay on the part of the transport which was bringing the mail home from China it got here two days too late for the War Department to make the appointment within the limit of time allowed by law.

Mr. KING. I have no objection.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment, on page 1, line 9, after the word "Columbia," to strike out the words "and if necessary, in order to accomplish this purpose, the number of warrant officers authorized by law for the Army is hereby increased by one," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That notwithstanding the provisions of existing law, the Secretary War is hereby authorized to take the same action with respect to the application of Master Sergt. August J. Mack for appointment as a warrant officer, United States Army, that he could have taken had the application of Sergeant Mack not been delayed in the mail en route from China to Washington, D. C.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MORRIS FOX CHERRY

The bill (H. R. 12538) for the benefit of Morris Fox Cherry was considered as in Committee of the Whole. The bill had been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment on page 1, line 10, after the numerals "1918," to insert the words "Provided, That no bounty, back pay, pension, or allowance shall be held to have accrued prior to the passage of this act," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of any laws conferring rights, privileges, and benefits upon honorably discharged soldiers, Morris Fox Cherry, who was a member of Battery A, One hundred and thirty-second Field Artillery, Thirty-sixth Division, shall hereafter be held and considered to have been discharged honorably from the military service of the United States as a private of that organization on the 16th day of April, 1918: Provided, That no bounty, back pay, pension, or allowance shall be held to have accrued prior to the passage of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

CLARENCE E. BURT

The bill (H. R. 4935) to authorize the appointment of First Lieut. Clarence E. Burt, retired, to the grade of captain, retired, in the United States Army, was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to appoint and commission Clarence E. Burt, first lieutenant, United States Army, retired, to the grade of captain, United States Army, retired, said grade being effective as of December 8, 1918, with the retired pay of captain, said pay to be based on his length of service on January 29, 1920, the date of his retirement: Provided, That no bounty, back pay, pension, or allowance shall be held to have accrued prior to the passage of this act.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I would like to have an explanation of the measure.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, this is the most difficult and technical matter we have had to contend with for some time. The law and the order of the department under the act of 1917 provided that no first lieutenant of the Medical Corps should be promoted to captain without examination and no examination should be had for such promotion unless, if an officer of the Medical Corps, he should have completed one year's continuous service in that corps. This officer was one of a class of 15 reserve and National Guard officers appointed in the Regular Army by recommendation of the Surgeon General. They were nominated to the Senate on December 13, 1917, and confirmed by the Senate December 18, 1917, but the appointment was not actually made until 10 days later—December 28, 1917. Meantime the class of medical officers which came into the service afterwards were all promoted to captaincies in December, 1918, and so would have been Lieutenant Burt but because of the fact that he was disabled during war time and was retired a few days before the year was up. The other officers of the same group of 15 have all retired from the service and that is why the bill applies only to him.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

OREN W. RYNEARSON

The bill (H. R. 8974) authorizing the President to order Oren W. Rynearson before a retiring board for a hearing of his case and upon the findings of such board determine whether or not he be placed on the retired list with the rank and pay held by him at the time of his resignation was considered as in Committee of the Whole and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War, under the direction of the President, is hereby authorized, in his discretion, to order Oren W. Rynearson, late second lieutenant, United States Army, before a retiring board for the purpose of a hearing of his case and to inquire into and determine the facts touching the nature and occasion of his disability, and to find and report the cause which, in its judgment, has produced his incapacity, and whether such cause is an incident of the service, according to the statute, and that upon the findings of such board the President is further authorized, in his discretion, to nominate and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint said Oren W. Rynearson, a second lieutenant, the grade which he had at the time of his resignation, and to place him on the retired list of the Army: Provided, That no bounty, back pay, pension, or allowance shall be held to have accrued prior to the passage of this act.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOINT COMMISSION OF INSULAR REORGANIZATION

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, a little while ago, when Calendar 1131, the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 9) to establish a joint commission on insular reorganization, was reached, the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR] asked that it go over. I understand that now he has looked into the matter and is willing to have the joint resolution considered.

Mr. McKELLAR. I have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to returning to Calendar 1131?

There being no objection the Senate as in committee of the whole proceeded to consider the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 9) to establish a joint commission on insular reorganization which had been reported from the Committee on Territories and Insular Possessions with an amendment, on page 1, line 7, to strike out the word "elect."

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, I ask that the amendment be disagreed to. Due to the fact that the bill was reported last May the word "elect" should be left in.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 1, line 7, strike out the word "seventieth" and insert the word "seventy-first."

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The next amendment will be stated.

The next amendment of the committee was on page 2, line 13, to strike out "December 15, 1928," and insert in lieu thereof "December 16, 1929." so as to make the bill read:

Resolved, etc., That there is hereby established a joint congressional commission to be known as the joint commission on insular reorganization and to be composed of five Senators, appointed by the President of the Senate, and five Members elect of the House of Representatives, for the Seventy-first Congress, appointed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives. The commission is authorized and directed to make a careful study and examination of the various executive agencies of the Government engaged in the administration, supervision, and direction of matters pertaining to the insular possessions of the United States with a view to determining (1) the advisability of placing all such matters under the administration, supervision, and direction of one bureau or department of the Government, (2) the necessary and advisable transfers of executive functions to such bureau or department, and (3) a plan of organization for such bureau or department. The heads of the several executive departments and independent establishments shall, upon the request of the commission, detail representatives from their respective departments and establishments to assist the commission in such study and examination. The commission shall make a report in writing to the Congress on or before December 16, 1929, which shall contain a complete statement of the results of such study and examination and recommendations for appropriate legislative or other action.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LAKE MICHIGAN BRIDGE, CHICAGO, ILL.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, the bill, on page 2, line 2, should be amended by striking out the words "and assigns." It is a rule of the Committee on Commerce that when we grant consent to a municipality or something of the kind to construct a bridge we grant the permit to it or its successors, but we do not permit it to assign to private parties. The conditions as to private parties are different from those applying to municipalities. In line 2, page 2, I move to amend by striking out the words "and assigns."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JONES. In line 12, on the same page, I move to amend by striking out the words "and assigns."

If such bridge shall at any time be taken over or acquired by the States or public agencies or political subdivisions thereof, or by either of them, as provided in section 4 of this act, and if tolls are thereafter charged for the use thereof, the rates of toll shall be so adjusted as to provide a fund sufficient to pay for the reasonable cost of maintaining, repairing, and operating the bridge and its approaches under economical management, and to provide a sinking fund sufficient to amortize the amount paid therefor, including reasonable interest and financing cost, as soon as possible under reasonable charges, but within a period of not to exceed 20 years from the date of acquiring the same. An accurate record of the amount paid for acquiring the bridge and its approaches, the actual expenditures for maintaining, repairing, and operating the same and of the daily tolls collected, shall be kept and shall be available for the information of all persons interested.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. BORAH obtained the floor.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, as I understand, the bill just passed completes the call of the calendar. We passed over on the calendar Order of Business 785, being the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 117) authorizing an investigation and survey for a Nicaraguan canal, authorizing a complete survey of certain improvements absolutely necessary on the Panama Canal, and further complete survey of the proposed Nicaraguan canal. I have conferred with the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING], who interposed an objection at the time the joint resolution was reached on the calendar, and I should now like to ask unanimous consent to consider the joint resolution. It is only a little after 3 o'clock, and we can probably dispose of it during the afternoon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. EDGE. I understand that the joint resolution, if taken up, will not displace the unfinished business, but I am merely making an endeavor to dispose of the joint resolution, and the unfinished business, of course, will be retained in its present status.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, let me say to the Senator from New Jersey that I should like to move to go into open executive session for the purpose of disposing of a situation with reference to the multilateral peace treaty.

Mr. MOSES. I should like to ask the Senator from Idaho if he can not withhold that motion. I know it takes precedence over the request of the Senator from New Jersey, but it is an open secret that arrangements are progressing so that it is probable that a unanimous-consent agreement of some nature may be reached regarding the treaty probably at the session to-morrow. Therefore if that motion could be withheld until we could get into open executive session to-morrow, I am sure an arrangement satisfactory to the Senator from Idaho and to all other Senators who are interested in the document may be arrived at.

Since I am speaking of secrets, which are more or less open, I should like to add another which can not be of consequence to the Senate as a whole but certainly is of moment to Members on this side of the aisle. The Republican committee on committees has a scheduled meeting this afternoon, which must be held, and the sooner we can get at that important business the better, especially for the Senators whose prerogatives are involved.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I do not know of any Senator who is ready to proceed this afternoon to discuss the treaty, and there is a possibility that——

Mr. BRUCE. I think the Senator from Idaho is mistaken about that. I am prepared to discuss it, though I prefer that other Senators who may desire to speak should precede me. However, I will adjust myself to their convenience.

Mr. MOSES. In that connection, if the Senator from Idaho will permit, I will ask the attention of the Senate for a few moments in connection with the treaty to-morrow.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I expect to ask unanimous consent that instead of adjourning the Senate shall take a recess to meet to-morrow at 12 o'clock, so that we shall not really lose any time.

Mr. MOSES. That is, the request will be made when we are in executive session?

Mr. BORAH. Yes; that we shall take a recess instead of adjourning.

Mr. MOSES. I shall interpose no objection to that.

MULTILATERAL PEACE TREATY

Mr. BORAH. We can settle it after we go into executive session. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the so-called multilateral peace treaty in open executive session.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Idaho.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, in open executive session, resumed the consideration of the treaty for the renunciation of war transmitted to the Senate for ratification by the President of the United States, December 4, 1928, and reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations December 19, 1928.

Mr. EDGE. Now, Mr. President, as in legislative session——

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, may I inquire just what is the present status?

Mr. BORAH. The present status is that the treaty is before the Senate.

Mr. MOSES. With no Senator ready to discuss it?

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, the Senator from Maryland, as I understood, said that he was ready to discuss it.

Mr. BRUCE. If it is desired, I will proceed at this time.

Mr. BORAH. If the Senator from Maryland is ready, we will be glad to hear him.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, I withdraw my request for unanimous consent.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, I have already had occasion to comment on the Kellogg peace pact, but since that time it has undergone considerable discussion in the Senate, and this discussion has taken some directions which make me feel that it might not be amiss for me now to add something to what I have already said.

There are several distinct views that may be taken of the practical value of this pact. One is that it is a mere empty interchange of mutual promises which begin and end in grandiloquent words. Article 1 of the pact says that the parties to it solemnly condemn recourse to war for the solution of international controversies and renounce it as an instrument of international policy in their relations with one another. But if mere ceremonious solemnity of utterance is not a sanction, the pact has no sanction whatsoever. It does not create any military or economic agency for the enforcement of its provisions; it does not suggest any penalty of any kind for a breach of those provisions by any faithless party to it. In other words, generally speaking, it can be said that from the point of view to which I have just referred, it is the most despicable thing imaginable; that is to say, it is a formal, deliberate utterance with no sanction of any kind behind it by which respect for its terms may be compelled.

The idea of the pact is that should any party to it violate its covenants no practical consequence whatever is to follow, except that, as respects that party, the other parties to the pact are to be released from all their obligations under it. As regards sanctions, the case is such a case as might arise where one individual violates a solemn promise to another, and the other has no observation to make upon the fact except, perhaps, to exclaim: "You are not the individual that I took you for"; or "you are no gentleman." That would seem to be rather an extreme illustration, but it is a fair illustration from the point of view that I am now considering, of the puerility, the utter impotence of the Kellogg pact so far as any direct or immediate efficacy upon its part to preserve the peace of the world is concerned. A party to the pact violates its obligations under the pact. All that any other party to the pact is expected to say to it is: "So far as you are concerned I no longer solemnly condemn recourse to war for the solution of international controversies; I no longer renounce war as an instrument of national policy."

Still speaking from the same point of view as heretofore, I might say without hesitation that the Kellogg pact represents the last stage of nervous and degenerate effeminacy in the history of the pacifist movement in this country. This is strong language, but, from this point of view, I believe it to be absolutely justified by the circumstances of the case.

This statement is all the more strongly warranted by the circumstance that the pacifist sentiment behind the pact has receded recently from the considerably more advanced ground that it occupied a short time ago in relation to the spirit in which an infraction of such an instrument should be met by the parties who had not violated their obligations under it.

Then the same pacifists who are primarily responsible for the Kellogg pact were talking about what? Why, the "outlawry" of war. Now, anyone who is familiar with the history of crime knows what "outlawry" meant. In past ages, when an individual was denounced as an outlaw he was pursued with hue and cry and hound and horn until he was run down and brought to earth like some noxious vermin. Only a few months ago Mr. E. O. Levinson—who is really the father of the form of pacifism evidenced by the Kellogg pact—was declaring that war should be outlawed; and it was only a few years before that a resolution was introduced into this body by the distinguished Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] calling for the outlawry of war, and, as a means looking to that end, first for the adoption of an international code by the great civilized powers of the world—a most excellent idea in its proper place—and then for the establishment of some sort of international court of justice like the Supreme Court of the United States.

All that talk about outlawry, all that talk about the adoption of an international code, all that talk about the establishment of an international court of justice, has apparently been relegated to oblivion. The word "outlawry" is now too virile, too robust, too militant a word, to accord with the present temper of the pacifist mind in this country. So it is abandoned; and instead of talking about the outlawry of war, the conspicuous individuals in the United States who but very recently were carrying on that kind of talk are roaring as gently as a suckling dove in the Kellogg pact—a pact, as I have said, that is wholly sanctionless; that does not suggest one single practical agency by which any faithless party to the pact may be made to pay in any way the just penalty of his faithlessness.

So much in this connection for section 1 of the Kellogg pact.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. BRUCE. Yes; certainly.

Mr. KING. I think the criticism which the Senator has made of the Kellogg pact is probably warranted—that is, as to its lack of sanctions or any punitive provisions—but the Senator knows that there are two lines of thought; one followed by those who believe that the object sought by this treaty, in the prevention of war, can be attained only by moral influences and by moral suasion; the other represented perhaps by some of the European powers and by many persons in the United States who believe that war can only be prevented where sanctions are provided.

I think the Senator and I belong to the school that believed in the League of Nations. I still believe in the League of Nations——

Mr. BRUCE. Indeed, I do.

Mr. KING. And regret that the United States is not a member of the league.

Mr. BRUCE. And of the World Court.

Mr. KING. And of the World Court. I believe in sanctions. I think Mr. Roosevelt, in his speech when be obtained the Nobel prize, announced the correct view—that there must be some power to punish a recalcitrant nation that runs amuck and disturbs the peace of the world. The point I am trying to get at, however, is this: Aside from an organization such as the League of Nations that is authorized to enforce sanctions, what alternative is there?

Mr. BRUCE. None; though I am perfectly free to say that I think that all movements which have universal peace as their ideal, however feeble in their direct influence, in some appreciable degree hasten the time when this country will be ready to enter the World Court and the League of Nations. In other words, I think that even this peace pact tends to create an atmosphere favorable to the final adoption by this country of some more effective means for the preservation of peace than it or the like.

So much for article 1 of the Kellogg peace pact. That, the distinguished Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] says, is not the article of the pact to which he attaches the highest degree of importance. The article of the pact which has, to use his own expression, "the active virtue" of pacification in it is article 2; but when we come to article 2, what do we find? It is an article which simply says, in the same sort of pompous language as that employed in article 1 of the pact, that the high contracting parties to the pact agree that the solution or settlement of all disputes or conflicts of every kind or nature which may arise among them shall never be sought except by pacific means.

But by what sort of pacific means? Is it by arbitration, by conciliation, by a court of international justice, or by still other means? In other words, article 2 of the pact declares that no settlement of any international conflict or dispute shall be sought except by pacific means; and yet is totally silent as to the specific pacific means by which settlement is to be sought.

In spite, therefore, of "the active virtue" which the distinguished Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] assigns to article 2 of the Kellogg pact, one might well see nothing in it but the same uncertainty, the same vagueness, the same impotence which characterize article 1 of the pact.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana in the chair). Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. BRUCE. Yes; I am glad to yield.

Mr. KING. If the Senator will pardon me for expressing dissent from his view, I should like to submit this interrogatory: Does not the Senator think that if two or more nations solemnly agree that they will not resort to war, and will settle by pacific means every controversy, every dispute arising from every cause, no matter what it may be, that will tend to promote peace? Does not the Senator think that such a solemn assertion—and we must assume that such an assertion is made in good faith by the signatories—would tend to restrain nations that were somewhat bellicose, and induce them to adopt every possible means to reach a settlement short of war?

Mr. BRUCE. But the negotiations that resulted in the Kellogg pact show that no two nations will ever enter into such an agreement. The history of that pact, apart from the interpretative notes which accompany it, demonstrates beyond a doubt, in my judgment, that the pact was intended to be far more comprehensive and sweeping than is now contended for by the distinguished Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH].

Mr. BORAH. Does the Senator contend that the treaty as it was signed was more sweeping?

Mr. BRUCE. Yes; than the treaty whittled down by three interpretative notes.

Mr. BORAH. But does the Senator contend that any statement which I made upon the floor is not in accordance with the terms of the treaty and the notes?

Mr. BRUCE. I do.

Mr. BORAH. What statement?

Mr. BRUCE. In the first place, as I understand the Senator, he contends that the right of self-defense falls within the express wording of this pact, and I take issue with him right at that point.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator may take issue with me, but our Government did not take issue with me. Our Government stated specifically that it was implicit in every treaty.

Mr. BRUCE. Of course Mr. Kellogg, after the pact was worded, could place any gloss on it that he chose, and the necessity of his position was such that he was bound to contend that the right of self-defense was exempted from its operation. Just turn to the language of the pact itself:

The high contracting parties solemnly declare in the names of their respective peoples that they condemn recourse to war for the solution of international controversies.

Literally speaking, at any rate, does not that mean international controversies of every kind, whether springing from the exercise of the right of self-defense or from any other root?

Mr. BORAH. The Senator made the statement that some statement of mine had taken from the treaty the significance which it would have had without the statement, or, in other words, that I curtailed its meaning.

Mr. BRUCE. Not at all.

Mr. BORAH. And he referred to the question of self-defense. This is what our Government said:

The right of self-defense is inherent in every sovereign State and implicit in every treaty. No specific reference to that inalienable right of sovereignty is therefore necessary or desirable.

That is the exact position which the Senator from Idaho took.

Mr. BRUCE. That may affect our Government's position practically, but not in a legal sense; it does not affect at all the true import of the words that are actually employed in the pact. I am saying what the words of that pact mean independently of any commentary that has been made on them by Mr. Kellogg or any foreign country. I say that, approaching the fact without reference to anything that any government has said about it by way of interpretation, its language, both in article 1 and article 2, is broad enough to include international controversies of every description, whether controversies involving the right of self-defense or not.

Article 1 says that—

The high contracting parties * * * condemn recourse to war for the solution of international controversies.

Certainly, naturally construed, that means international controversies of every kind and description, whether involving the right of self-defense or not. Then article 2, in words equally as broad, or broader, says:

The high contracting parties agree that the settlement or solution of all disputes or conflicts—

Listen to this—of whatever nature, or of whatever origin—

That is to say, whether arising out of the right of self-defense or not—shall never be sought except by pacific means.

Mr. BORAH. Would the Senator support a treaty which he thought deprived his Government of the right of self-defense?

Mr. BRUCE. Of course I would not.

Mr. BORAH. And nobody else would.

Mr. BRUCE. In other words, if this pact were not accompanied by these interpretative notes, including the constructions placed by Mr. Kellogg upon it, I would as soon thrust my hand into an incandescent furnace as to vote for it.

Mr. BORAH. Then I ask again in what respect the statement of the Senator from Idaho changed the meaning from that which the Government gave.

Mr. BRUCE. If the Senator will refresh his memory, I think he will find that I am right in saying that what he said was that in order to place the construction upon this pact which the Senator placed upon it, as respects the right of self-defense, and everything else, it is not necessary to resort to the interpretative notes at all.

Mr. BORAH. That is exactly what Mr. Kellogg says, that it is inherent in the sovereign power and implicit in every treaty. We do not have to insert it.

Mr. BRUCE. But the Senator misses the point. I have not been discussing what Mr. Kellogg said; I have been discussing what this pact says.

Mr. BORAH. I understood the Senator was discussing what I said.

Mr. BRUCE. No; I will discuss that later.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Mr. President, if the Senator from Idaho is going out of the Chamber, I want to ask him a question, if I may have the permission of the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. BRUCE. Certainly.

Mr. REED of Missouri. There is one matter we have not covered in discussing the proposition of self-defense. Before I ask my question I say, by way of elucidation, that it is, of course, agreed by the Secretary of State, and seems now to be agreed by nearly everybody, that, notwithstanding the particular language of the treaty, the right of self-defense exists, unimpaired, because it can not be waived, and is inherent in every obligation.

The right of self-defense has been construed to mean not only the right to defend the territory of a nation but to defend its trade and commerce and protect and maintain the doctrines which nations have established, in the nature of the Monroe doctrine and similar doctrines applicable to European countries. That, of course, is a very broad definition of self-defense, and it may include what I am going to speak of.

My attention has been called by one of the great lawyers of the country to another proposition which I have not heard mentioned; that is, the right of a nation to protect its citizens in foreign lands. With the permission of the Senator from Maryland—and I hesitate to interrupt his speech in this way, and I have already taken more time than I intended——

Mr. BRUCE. I am glad to yield.

Mr. REED of Missouri. I have this letter from Victor Morawetz, who is the author of one of the great works of law:

The only "pacific means" by which an international dispute or conflict can be settled is either by negotiation or by a judicial decree or a finding of arbitrators which both parties have agreed to abide by and perform.

The United States, by becoming a party to the Kellogg-Briand treaty, would agree that in case of a dispute or conflict, of whatever nature, it will do nothing except to seek a settlement by negotiation or by judicial decision or arbitration. If the offending party refuses redress, or refuses to submit the dispute or conflict to a court or to arbitrators, or refuses to perform the decision of the court or arbitrators, apparently the United States will be obligated to do nothing whatever.

That might be argued over.

Thus, if a foreign nation should seize the property of American citizens or should imprison them or kill them outside of the United States, we should be obligated to do nothing except to seek redress by negotiation, legal proceedings, or arbitration; and if the offending party refuses to join in that method of settlement, we should apparently be obligated to suffer the wrong without redress.

There is more of the letter, but that brings up the point. Is the protection of the life or the property of an American citizen in a foreign country included in the right of self-defense? I would like to get the Senator's view on that.

Mr. BORAH. I stated on Friday, in answer to a question of the Senator from Connecticut, that I had no doubt it was. Assuming that life and property are in actual danger.

Mr. REED of Missouri. I did not know the Senator had already committed himself on that.

Mr. BRUCE. The Senator stated that, I recall.

Mr. REED of Missouri. If that is true, then we would not be prohibited from joining again with other nations, or by ourselves doing acts similar to that which occurred in the Boxer disturbances, or in the recent disturbances in China, or that which was done by Mr. Wilson in our troubles with Mexico.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I do not know that I would undertake to pass upon particular acts, as to whether there had been attack, and therefore we were entitled to exercise our right of self-defense, but I have no doubt at all, first, that the protection of the lives and property of our citizens in foreign lands comes under the principle of self-defense and also under international law.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Then the right of a nation to defend itself means the right to defend its citizens and their property?

Mr. BORAH. Exactly; and, secondly, that whenever an emergency does arise, whatever the facts are, the judgment as to whether it is an attack and as to whether we should exercise our right of self-defense or not, is solely with us.

Mr. REED of Missouri. As far as our action is concerned.

Mr. BORAH. Yes.

Mr. REED of Missouri. But other nations might say that we had acted unjustly or made a wrong decision.

Mr. BORAH. Of course, they could claim that.

Mr. REED of Missouri. I thank the Senator. I simply wanted that point cleared up, and I did not know it had been adverted to.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, will the Senator from Maryland permit me to interject one more question?

Mr. BRUCE. In just a moment. Of course, my remarks have been suspended for quite a little while now.

The point I was making was that if the two articles of this pact are construed independently of the interpretative notes that accompany it, then, in accordance with every accepted canon of legal construction, the provisions of the pact are broad enough to include not only wars of ambition or aggression, but wars waged in the exercise of the national right of defense, wars waged in vindication of the covenant of the League of Nations, and wars waged in vindication of the covenants of the Locarno treaties and of the neutrality pacts as well, into which France has entered; and also wars waged by Great Britain against countries attacking any region the welfare of which she claims is a matter of peculiar concern to her.

That, I say, is the natural, proper, and inevitable construction that any lawyer worth his salt would place upon the wording of the pact. Mind you, the construction for which I am contending is not an unnatural one. It is one entirely in harmony with the ideas of peace that had for some time before this pact was framed been entertained in this country by some of the leaders of the special school of pacifism of which the Kellogg pact is an outgrowth. That school of pacifists draws no distinction between offensive war and defensive war.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator is in error about that, I think.

Mr. BRUCE. I think not.

Mr. BORAH. The reason why I say that is because I introduced a resolution here some four years ago which was expressive of the views of that particular, peculiar class of pacifists as the Senator has named them—Mr. Levinson and others—and I especially excepted in that resolution the right of self-defense.

Mr. BRUCE. But, now, did the Senator do so? I will turn to a copy of his resolution to see whether he did or not.

Mr. BORAH. The last resolution which I introduced? That is true, because we concluded that it was implicit, as we said in every agreement, and inherent in every power; but the first resolution which I introduced——

Mr. BRUCE. Sometimes it is the first expression of our thoughts and aims that has the most value.

Mr. BORAH. Yes; I think so. That is the reason why I said what I did.

Mr. BRUCE. I have here a copy of the resolutions introduced by the able Senator in the Senate on December 12, 1927, in which it is said in the first resolution therein contained:

> That it is the view of the Senate of the United States that war between nations should be outlawed as an institution or means for the settlement of international controversies by making it a public crime under the law of nations and that every nation should be encouraged by solemn agreement or treaty to bind itself to indict and punish its own international war breeders or instigators and war profiteers under powers similar to those conferred upon our Congress under Article I, section 8, of our Federal Constitution, which clothes the Congress with the power "to define and punish offenses against the law of nations."

The resolutions then go on to say:

> Resolved further, That a code of international law of peace based upon the outlawing of war and upon the principle of equality and justice between the nations, amplified and expanded and adapted and brought down to date, should be created and adopted.

Certainly there is not one single word of all these words that I have just read to indicate that to the mind of the Senator from Idaho or of his associates at that time, Mr. Levinson and others, there is any just distinction to be taken, as respects the outlawry of war, between war waged in the exercise of the right of self-defense and any other kind of war whatsoever. The Senator at that time was simply acting in complete harmony, so far as I can judge, with the views that had been previously expressed by persons associated and in sympathy with him.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the resolution to which the Senator refers is as he stated, but as I stated before, when I first introduced the resolution, it read as follows:

> Whereas an international arrangement of such judicial character would not shackle the independence or impair the sovereignty of any nation and would not involve or affect the right of self-defense against invasion or attack, such right being inherent—

And so forth.

Mr. BRUCE. Is that in the preamble of the same resolution?

Mr. BORAH. The resolution which I introduced the year before.

Mr. BRUCE. Oh, yes, the year before; but I am speaking now of the resolution of 1927.

Mr. BORAH. As I said a moment ago, the first two or three times the resolution I introduced did contain the reference to self-defense. Afterwards it did not because I concluded after investigation that that was an inherent right implicit in any agreement we might make and could not be alienated. I see no reason to refer to it expressly.

Mr. BRUCE. May not the Senator in the meantime have worked himself up to a still higher degree of pacifism and come to the conclusion that a war of self-defense as well as all other wars should be included in the condemnation of some such pact as the Kellogg pact?

Mr. BORAH. No; I have not reached that stage of pacifism, and I trust I may never be so unfaithful and thoughtless of my country's interests as to reach that point.

Mr. BRUCE. I am justified in saying that I am a little surprised that the Senator should now take such a very conservative view about the condition in which an infraction of the Kellogg pact would leave any party to that pact which had been faithless to its promises. I hold in my hand a little brochure written by Mr. Kirby Page, entitled "The Renunciation of War." On page 19 of that brochure he said that he received a letter from the distinguished Senator from Idaho——

Mr. BORAH. No; the Senator is again mistaken. He did not receive a letter.

Mr. BRUCE. Then, perhaps I should have referred to a conversation between Mr. Page and the Senator rather than to a letter. I supposed that there was a letter, because Mr. Page says in this pamphlet:

> Some months ago, in response to my request for an opinion on this point, Senator BORAH said.

Perhaps, now that the Senator's memorandum has refreshed his mind, he can recall the fact that what he said to Mr. Page was in the form of a letter. It was certainly in some formal shape or other that he made his reply, because Mr. Kirby Page speaks of what the Senator said as being in response to his request for an opinion.

Mr. BORAH. It was in the nature of an interview.

Mr. BRUCE. Oh, I see! Is Mr. Page a journalist?

Mr. BORAH. I do not know whether he is a journalist or not, but he does some writing.

Mr. BRUCE. What he quoted the Senator as saying at that time—the pamphlet was copyrighted in 1928—was this:

> Senator BORAH said that another important result of such a treaty—

That is, the Kellogg multilateral treaty—> would be to enlist the support of the United States in cooperative action against any nation which is guilty of a flagrant violation of this outlawry agreement. Of course the Government of the United States must reserve the right to decide in the first place whether or not the treaty has been violated and, second, what coercive measure it feels obliged to take; but—

And it is to this language that I especially desire to direct attention—> it is quite inconceivable that this country would stand idly by in case of a grave breach of a multilateral treaty to which it is a party.

Mr. BORAH. That was in the nature of an interview and here is the memorandum from which the interview was made. The question asked was this:

> What will be the position and the action of the United States in case some nation violates the treaty? Will it simply be that of indifference?

The answer was as follows:

> Of course, the United States would not be indifferent. It would be interested in keeping the treaty alive. In case of a violation or in case it was claimed there was a violation, the United States would determine for itself whether there had been a violation. If it concludes the treaty had been broken, the United States would be entirely free as to its future course. It would then be in the same position and enjoy the same freedom of action as if the treaty had never been written. I would assume, however, that being interested in the cause of peace it would pursue such course through peaceful means as would best serve the cause of peace and maintain the treaty.

Mr. BRUCE. Then the Senator did not say as he is reported by Mr. Page to have said:

> But it is quite inconceivable that this Government would stand idly by in the case of a grave breach of a multilateral treaty to which it was a party.

Mr. BORAH. No; I did not. I was evidently misunderstood; and, furthermore, that is confirmed by the fact——

Mr. BRUCE. The statement of the Senator is enough for me. I accept that as final.

Mr. BORAH. But in view of the possible importance of the matter I think the entire record ought to be put in. Only a few days, if my memory is correct, before that interview took place, in a signed communication to the New York Times on the treaty I had something to say and that signed communication was afterwards printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD upon the request of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDGE]. In that statement I said:

It is safe to prophesy—

This was some 10 days or two weeks before the other statement was made—

It is safe to prophesy that the United States will never become identified or cooperate with a system for peace based upon "pledges to wage war." But the United States now stands ready to cooperate and identify itself with a system based upon pledges not to wage war. * * * The effect of the Kellogg proposal is a solemn pledge to let that peace machinery work. It is a solemn pledge to rely upon the peace machinery of the peace plans and not upon the war machinery. It is a solemn pledge among the leading nations that they will not resort to war, that they are forever pledged to the employment of peaceful methods for the adjustment of their controversies.

That has been my position, I may say to the Senator, stated over and over again for the last five or six years. I was quite misunderstood if anyone has thought differently.

Mr. BRUCE. Hearing that, I am bound to admit that the Senator has consistently taken the view that when there is a breach of the Kellogg treaty no obligation of any kind is imposed upon any party to it to do anything.

I shall not detain the Senator any longer. I simply wanted to give him the opportunity to make what comments he pleased on those words which he was reported by Mr. Page to have used.

Now, let me say that even if we look no further than the face of the Kellogg pact it is impossible to reach the conclusion that it has any real practical value for the purpose of confirming international peace. It would be a very interesting book, indeed, that compiled all the treaties, pacts, and conventions of one sort and another to which the great civilized powers of the world have become parties; that have yet, in hours of passion, ruthless ambition, aggression, or greed, proved wholly powerless to keep the parties to them from flying at each other's throats. Not only has the field of human history, melancholy to relate, been strewn with the bodies of the dead victims of ever-recurring war but with the shattered promises of nations to abstain from war.

To establish the truth of this statement it is not necessary for us to go back to any remote stage of human history. When was there ever a more solemn and morally binding agreement entered into than the agreement that Germany, one of the highly civilized and enlightened powers of the earth, entered into in 1839 when guaranteeing Belgium's neutrality? Yet when the hour of temptation came did that guaranty prove, to recall the words of one of the great German leaders in the World War, anything but a "mere scrap of paper," such as I say that this Kellogg pact would prove were its strength ever subjected to any trying test? Forgetting all the obligations of her guaranty, Germany poured her helmeted legions into Belgium and forced her way across its violated soil to France. There is nothing to soften the story of that atrocious perfidy except the heroic resistance set up by the Belgian people under the leadership of their lion-hearted King and their noble primate, Cardinal Mercier, to the invader.

How idle is it for anyone to say to me, after the manner in which the Belgian people met that fearful crisis, that war is always a criminal and detestable thing; when waged in defense of home and hearthside it is at times a noble, glorious, I almost said a holy thing.

About the same time there was another illustration of the uncertainty that attends mere paper troth. If Italy had adhered to her tripartite treaty with Germany and Austria, when the World War came she would have taken her place in the struggle beside those two countries and not beside our allies and us. But she did not do so.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator from Maryland yield to me?

Mr. BRUCE. Yes.

Mr. KING. I hold no brief for Italy but I think the Senator—and I bow, of course, with deference to his superior knowledge of history—will upon a moment's reflection recall that Italy contended that the treaty to which he refers—the tripartite treaty between the Austro-Hungarian Empire and Germany and the Kingdom of Italy—did not present a casus fœderis and, therefore, Germany and Austria were not in a situation to ask Italy to join with them in the war. Italy took the ground that a proper construction of the treaty called upon her to render aid to Germany and Austria only if they were not the aggressors; if they were free from fault, if they were attacked. Italy contended that neither Germany nor Austria, under the conditions which precipitated the war, had a moral or legal right to invoke the aid of Italy. So Italy felt absolved from any obligation to take part with her two former associates, and having been so absolved she was at liberty later on to cast her lot with the allied cause.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, I have no disposition whatever to bear hardly upon the Italian people, because I can truly say that I cherish a special attachment to them. Apart from the people of my own country, I rather think that there are no people in the world for whom I cherish such cordial feelings, except the English people, including the Irish; but Italy, of course, like any other country, is caught up at times in the tides of irresistible fatality and has to do the best that she can. I am not disposed to deny that perhaps Italy was in a position at that time justly to claim that Germany was really engaged in a war of aggression and not in a war of self-defense, but at the same time I feel bound to remind the Senator from Utah, who always pours a stream of light on any subject that any Member of this body may be discussing, that Germany herself denies, and most strenuously if not bitterly denies, that she was an aggressor in the World War or that she was doing anything when she invaded Belgium except what was necessary for her to do by way of self-defense. I am at least justified in making the point that when it suits the self-interest of a nation, whose hands are tied by nothing but paper chains, to find a way out of the obligations of such a pact it is not likely to lack the astuteness to do so.

I will content myself for the present with just those two illustrations of the untrustworthiness of treaty obligations when two nations are impelled by powerful motives of one sort or another to violate them.

And rarely has there ever been a time when it would have been a more fatuous thing than it would be at the present time for us to abandon all thought of making a proper addition to the strength of our Navy, and to rely merely upon such an instrument as the Kellogg peace pact for our security. The other day the distinguished Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], with that kindling enthusiasm which is as much a part of his nature as is his eloquence, spoke of the tremendous moral forces which are operating at the present time to preserve the peace of the world and to give a real, substantial effect to such a pact as the Kellogg pact.

All I have to say in reply to that is that the Senator does not read the skies as I do at this hour. He sees tokens of approaching international tranquillity which I personally, and—what is far more important—many of the most distinguished contemporary statesmen of Europe, are utterly unable to see. In spite of the shipwrecked condition in which the finances of Europe were left by the World War, in spite of the poverty and misery entailed upon all the leading European countries by that war, their arsenals and military and naval workshops, and their legislative assemblies were never, to all appearances, busier or more active than they now are in making preparations for future wars.

Why, it was only a few days ago that the League of Nations—to which, it seems to me, we always have to turn when we are looking for some solid guaranty of international understanding and security—published a statement which shows what? Why, that at the present time the nations of the earth are expending $3,500,000,000 per annum, or one-sixth of their entire aggregate national income, for the maintenance of armies and navies; that throughout the civilized world there are at this time some 5,500,000 men under arms, or 1 soldier for every 300 civilians; and that there are in the world 1 ton of naval shipping for every 13 tons of merchant marine. So if there are any such moral forces operating throughout the world at the present hour for the extinguishment of war, as the sanguine Senator from Idaho pictures, I for one can not see that they are operating effectively.

Only a few days ago I called attention to the fact that Mussolini, in a recent speech in the Italian Parliament, had declared that cannon and bayonets are steadily increasing throughout Europe; and that Lloyd George, in an address which he has recently delivered in England, had made a statement practically to the same effect. Worst of all, it seems to be the general consensus of opinion to-day in England—that great, powerful, enlightened, generous nation with which we are connected by so many ties of blood and speech and of community of ideas and aims—that the relations between our country and Great Britain at the present time are decidedly unfriendly. That is what that splendid liberal sheet, the Manchester Guardian, has just told us.

That is what Lieutenant Commander Kenworthy has just told us. That is what other close English observers have just told us. Certainly the outlook of humanity is not very roseate as far as peace is concerned when the two great peace-loving countries of the world can be reasonably supposed to be so lacking in cordial feelings toward each other.

God forbid that I should suggest the thought that because of those conditions we should feel that it is necessary for us to match ships with England or claim that we are warranted in regarding with jealous apprehension everything that England does in the way of making proper provision for the security of her great Empire. Not until English and American admirals and naval experts were called into international disarmament conferences did any human being in this country—certainly any civilian human being in this country—entertain the idea that the British fleet, powerful as it was, was any real source of peril to us. On the contrary, until recently we were in the habit of deeming that fleet not only the protectress of the destinies of England and her far-flung Empire but of human liberty and civilization throughout the world. Such, in my humble opinion, it is still to-day, in spite of the envious, malicious feelings which are sought to be implanted in the breasts of the English people and our own breasts at this time by some individuals who should be ashamed of their evil work.

If I had been a member of the Geneva disarmament conference last year I think that I should have been enough of a statesman to have said to the representatives of England at it: "I am willing that England should have whatever cruisers she may reasonably believe to be indispensable for her special needs, which are unquestionably peculiarly urgent. She has never heretofore used her cruisers or battleships for the oppression of mankind. My belief is that in all human likelihood she never will do so; and during the recent World War she used them not only to secure the safety of England but to secure the safety of the world, including that of the United States." And if I had been one of the British representatives at the Geneva conference, I think that I should have been sufficiently a statesman to have said to the American representatives at it: "I am willing that the United States shall have whatever cruisers it may reasonably believe to be indispensable for its special needs. I believe that its motives and purposes, like our own, are essentially pacific. Like ourselves, it prizes the garnered fruits of human civilization and progress too highly ever lightly to engage in a mere war of ambition or spoliation."

All the same, however, in weighing the practical value of such a pact as the Kellogg peace pact, it is impossible for us, unless we are completely destitute of all sense of prudence, not to look at the naval and military conditions that actually prevail throughout the world to-day as they are, and even not—painful as it is for us to do so—to take into account the present unsatisfactory relations between our British brothers—for that is what they are to me, at any rate—and ourselves.

But whatever the face value of the Kellogg peace pact may be, it has been largely destroyed by the interpretative notes which accompany it. It is admitted that the pact has no application to the right of national self-defense; and who, pray, ever heard of a nation waging any modern war that it did not stamp as a defensive war? How easily that can be done is evidenced by the fact that not a few highly searching minds outside of Germany have recently reached the conclusion that Germany, after all, was by no means the only aggressor in the World War. According to the ideas of this puerile—if I may use such an expression without offense—peace pact, should a nation violate it, and go to war, all it would have to say is, "I alone have the privilege of determining whether this is, in truth, a war of self-defense or not. I pronounce it a defensive war," and that is the end of the matter. It is admitted by the most conspicuous defenders of the Kellogg peace pact themselves.

Then, of course, confessedly excluded so far as the advocates of the pact are concerned, from the operation of the pact, are wars that may be waged by the League of Nations, or by the parties to the Locarno treaties, or by the parties to the neutrality pacts, into which France has entered, or by Great Britain against any country making an attack upon any region in which she believes that she has a peculiar interest, in any part of the world which she encircles with the continuous martial strains of her military bands.

She has not thought proper to tell us in what particular regions of the earth she has such a peculiar special interest that any attack upon any one of them would be regarded by her as an attack upon herself. Is it Egypt? Is it the Suez Canal zone? Is it India? Or is it some other country or countries where her ubiquitous drumbeat is heard?

It has been said that we need pay no attention to the reservations of England with respect to those regions whatever they are; but how can that be reasonably contended? The English notes which accompany the Kellogg pact expressly, explicitly condition Great Britain's assent to the pact upon the understanding that she shall have entire freedom of discretion in dealing with any attack upon any one of those regions which she has now brought within the scope of a Monroe doctrine of her own. So I say that if the Kellogg peace pact ever did have any practical value for the purpose of staying the hand of war, it has none when the contracting effect of all the various reservations contained in the interpretative notes associated with it are duly taken into account.

I recall the fact that during the Spanish-American War one of our ambitious American officers complained that there was not enough war to go around, and so it seems to me that our friend, Mr. Kellogg, for whom I entertain the highest degree of personal respect, might well complain that as the result of those interpretative notes there is left very little war for the Kellogg peace pact to apply to.

I forgot to affirm that, in view of the express reservation of Great Britain in connection with her Monroe doctrine, it is idle to say that by signing the Kellogg peace pact the other parties to that pact, including ourselves, would not acquiesce in the reservation. That reservation, as the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] has pointed out, is in the nature of a condition precedent to the assumption by Great Britain of any obligation whatsoever under the Kellogg pact, and if this has not been accepted by the other parties to that pact, then Great Britain has not become a party to the pact at all.

Mr. President, if it suits the convenience of the Senate—and I am sure it will after these protracted remarks of mine—I hope the Senate will allow me the privilege of ceasing now and continuing my remarks to-morrow.

Mr. JONES. It will be understood that the Senator will have the floor to-morrow.

Mr. BRUCE. Very well.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there may be printed in the RECORD as part of this debate section 80 of Wilson's Treatise on International Law in regard to the interpretation of treaties.

In view of the fact that several times there has arisen in the debate a question as to the interpretation of treaties, and how they are to be interpreted, it seems to me it is very important that one of the leading authorities in this country on international law should be quoted at this time to show that treaties should receive reasonable interpretation, and that the words of treaties, as was pointed out by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] the other day when he referred to the dictionary, are to be interpreted in their usual sense; that when there is doubt as to the interpretation of the words of a treaty, the words are to be interpreted in their usual sense, unless it involves an absurdity or is incompatible with the general provisions of the treaty.

I ask unanimous consent that this may be printed in the RECORD without my reading it.

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From Wilson's Handbook of International Law, 2d ed., pp. 193 to 196]

80. Treaties should receive reasonable interpretation. In case of doubt in regard to interpretation, the following rules have been generally accepted:

(a) When there is doubt as to the interpretation of the words of a treaty: (1) The words are to be interpreted in their usual sense, unless this involves an absurdity or is incompatible with the general provisions of the treaty; (2) words having more than one meaning are interpreted in the more general sense, rather than the technical sense, unless clearly used in the technical sense; (3) words are to be interpreted as understood at the time of the negotiation of the treaty and favorably to the party assuming an obligation.

(b) When there is doubt as to the interpretation of the provisions of a treaty: (1) That which is specifically stated prevails against the more general; (2) a negative outweighs a corresponding positive; (3) provisions operating unequally may be strictly construed by the party suffering the greater burden; (4) single provisions should be interpreted with reference to the whole treaty.

(c) In case of conflict between different treaties: (1) If between treaties to which the same states are parties, the later treaty is binding; (2) if between earlier and later treaties to which the same states are not parties, the earlier treaty is binding.

The rules of interpretation have been set forth at various times by the Supreme Court of the United States. In the case of Geofroy v. Riggs, in 1890, the court said:

"It is a general principle of construction with respect to treaties that they shall be liberally construed so as to carry out the apparent intention of the parties to secure equality between them. As they are contracts between independent nations, in their construction words are to be taken in their ordinary meaning, as understood in the public law of nations, and not in any artificial or special sense impressed upon them by local law, unless such restricted sense is clearly intended. And it has been held by this court that, where a treaty admits of two constructions, one restrictive of rights that may be claimed under it and the other favorable to them, the latter is preferred." (Geofroy v. Riggs (1890), 133 U. S. 258, 10 S. Ct., 33 L. Ed. 642. See also Hauenstein v. Lynham (1879), 100 U. S. 487, 25 L. Ed. 628.)

In 1902, in the case of Tucker v. Alexanderoff, the broad basis of interpretation was stated: "As treaties are solemn engagements entered into between independent nations for the common advancement of their interests and the interests of civilization, and as their main object is not only to avoid war and secure a lasting and perpetual peace but to promote a friendly feeling between the people of the two countries, they should be interpreted in that broad and liberal spirit which is calculated to make for the existence of a perpetual amity, so far as it can be done without the sacrifice of individual rights or those principles of personal liberty which lie at the foundation of our jurisprudence." (Tucker v. Alexanderoff (1902), 183 U. S. 424, 22 S. Ct. 195, 46 L. Ed. 264.)

"Writers of authority agree that treaties are to be interpreted upon the principles which govern the interpretation of contracts in writing between individuals, and are to be executed in the utmost good faith, with a view to making effective the purposes of the high contracting parties; that all parts of a treaty are to receive a reasonable construction with a view to giving a fair operation to the whole." (Sullivan v. Kidd (1921), 254 U. S. 433, 41 S. Ct. 158, 65 L. Ed. 344; Missouri v. Holland (1920), 252 U. S. 416, 40 S. Ct. 382, 64 L. Ed. 641, 11 A. L. R. 984.)

While many rules for the interpretation of treaties have been given by various writers (2 Phillimore, Int. Law LXIV–XCIX; Crandall, Treaty Making and Enforcement, 5 Moore 249), controversies in regard to interpretation have in fact often resulted in the making of new treaties which would secure the objects sought by the states. Sometimes a protocol or declaration is added interpreting the treaty—e. g., in the final protocol of the Convention for the Protection of Industrial Property, June 2, 1911, "the words 'Propriété industrielle' (Industrial Property) shall be taken in their broadest acceptation; they extend to all production in the domain of agricultural industries (wines, grains, fruits, animals, etc.) and extractives (minerals, mineral waters, etc.)" (38 Stat. 1667.)

In the statute establishing the Permanent Court of International Justice, 1920, it was provided:

"ART. 38. The court shall apply—

"1. International conventions, whether general or particular, establishing rules expressly recognized by the contesting states;

"2. International custom, as evidence of a general practice accepted as law;

"3. The general principles of law recognized by civilized nations;

"4. Subject to the provisions of article 59, judicial decisions and the teachings of the most highly qualified publicists of the various nations, as subsidiary means for the determination of rules of law.

"This provision shall not prejudice the power of the court to decide a case ex aequo et bono if the parties agree thereto."

The British court, referring to the interpretation of the Sixth Hague Convention, 1907, Status of Enemy Merchant Vessels at the Outbreak of Hostilities, said:

"In construing such an international instrument as that now in question it is profitable to bear in mind from the outset sundry considerations which are not the less important for being doubtless somewhat obvious. It results from deliberations among the representatives of many powers, in which none can expect without some concession to insist upon his country's interests, its language, or its law. It is expressed in what is by tradition the common language of international intercourse, but it would be unreasonable in the circumstances to expect of it either nicety of scholarship or exactitude of literary idiom. Neither the municipal law nor the technical terms of the negotiating countries can be expected to find a place in its provisions. Where interests conflict, much must be allowed to the effects of compromise; where the principles by which future action is to be guided are laid down broadly, leaving to the powers concerned the actual measures to be taken in execution of those principles, it is unreasonable to expect a greater precision than the circumstances admit of or to reject as incomplete provisions which are expressed without much detail and sometimes only in outline.

"On the other hand, it is specially necessary to discover and to give effect to all of the beneficent intentions which such instruments embody and which their general tenor indicates. It is impossible to suppose, whatever the imperfections of their phrasing, that the framers of such instruments should have intended any power to escape its obligations by a quibbling interpretation, by a mere pedantic adherence to particular words, or by emphasizing the absence of express words, where the sense to be implied from the purport of the convention is reasonably plain. Least of all can it be supposed that His Majesty's Government could have become parties to such an instrument in any narrow sense, such as would reserve for them future loopholes of escape from its general scope." The Blonde and Other Ships (1922), 1 A. C. 313; Wils. Int. L. (2d ed.).

RECONSIDERATION OF SENATE BILLS

Mr. DENEEN. Mr. President, as in open legislative session, I ask unanimous consent to move to reconsider the vote by which the Senate passed the bill (S. 4915), granting the consent of Congress to the South Park commissioners, and the commissioners of Lincoln Park, separately or jointly, their successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across that portion of Lake Michigan lying opposite the entrance to Chicago River, Ill.; and granting the consent of Congress to the commissioners of Lincoln Park, their successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Michigan Canal, otherwise known as the Ogden Slip, in the city of Chicago, Ill. I ask that the motion may lie over one day. I will state my reason for this request. A similar bill was passed in the House about 20 minutes before the Senate bill was passed.

I desire to make a like motion as to Senate bill 4744, granting the consent of Congress to the city of Aurora, State of Illinois, to construct and maintain and operate a bridge across the Fox River within the city of Aurora, State of Illinois; and Senate bill 4745, granting the consent of Congress to the city of Aurora, State of Illinois, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Fox River within the city of Aurora, State of Illinois. Similar bills were passed by the House this afternoon, and will be here to-morrow. I shall then make a motion to substitute the House bills for the Senate bills.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana in the chair). Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, as in open legislative session I make the same request as to Senate bill 4644, to authorize an appropriation for completing the new cadet mess hall United States Military Academy. I am advised that the House duplicate of this bill passed the House to-day, and I desire to enter a motion for a reconsideration of the vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

MESSAGE OF GOV. FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT, OF NEW YORK

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a brief message of the governor of my State to the legislature.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the message was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE GOVERNOR'S MESSAGE

STATE OF NEW YORK,
EXECUTIVE CHAMBER,
Albany, January 2, 1929.

Members of the Legislature of the State of New York:

I come before the legislature not only in accordance with the constitution to communicate the condition of the State but also to express the hope and belief that neither you nor I are entering upon our offices with partisan purpose. From the day of our election we become individually and jointly the representatives of all the people of the State.

We are charged with the duty of carrying on the existing functions of the government and also of initiating changes in present laws, made necessary by changing times, and of undertaking also new projects which an advancing civilization make desirable.

The past six years have been an unparalelled era in our State. We have pointed the way of progress to our sister States and we must not allow this progress to flag during the coming year.

Most of our problems are not political; they can be solved by the same kind of cooperation on your part which I as the executive of the State hereby offer to you. A few are matters of an honest difference of opinion; must of these also can, I hope, find practical solution by frank discussion and honest effort to obtain results.

FINANCES

I inherit from my distinguished predecessor a financial balance sheet showing an excellent condition in the treasury, and the prospect of a substantial balance at the end of the current fiscal year. Detailed figures will be submitted to you in a few weeks with the budget for the following fiscal year. From a preliminary examination of anticipated receipts, and of expenditures which are either mandatory or essential for the carrying on of existing business and of authorized projects, I am confident that we can arrive at a balanced budget, or, in other words, keep our expenditures within the figure of our anticipated income.

This does not, however, make allowance for new State undertakings, of which some are vital, nor does it make allowance for readjustment or reduction of certain taxes which now bear too heavily upon portions of our rural population. In spite of previous studies, little progress has been made in the formulation of a plan for a more scientific and equitable distribution of taxation. I urge the appointment of a nonpolitical commission to this end.

AGRICULTURE

I want the agricultural problems studied without regard to partisan politics, and it is my hope that through appointing an agricultural commission composed of members of the legislature, master farmers, representatives of the College of Agriculture, the Grange, the Farm Bureau, the Home Bureau, the Dairymen's League, and other farm cooperatives, the legislature from their recommendations will be able to act favorably and constructively on this most important subject.

It may be that adequate investigation will show that many of the farms abandoned within the period of agricultural depression since 1920 should not be restored to agriculture but should be devoted to growing a future timber supply for the people of the State. Also we do not want the present alarming rate of farm abandonment to continue; we must therefore make special efforts to make it possible for those who are now engaged in agriculture on suitable agricultural land to continue under more favorable and more profitable conditions.

I hope that this agricultural commission will make a special study and investigation of the whole farm assessment and tax situation in order to obtain a fairer adjustment of the farmers' taxes. The ultimate goal is that the farmer and his family shall be put on the same level of earning capacity as his fellow American who lives in the city.

The problem of distribution of farm products should also be studied to the end that the unnecessarily high differential between what the farmer receives and what the consumer pays may be materially lowered, giving a better price to the farmer for his products and a lower cost to the consumer for what he buys.

WATER POWER

On the subject of the development of water-power sites, owned in part or in whole by the people of the State, I am convinced of two facts: First, that there is a definite demand for the undertaking of their development—not several years hence but this year; second, that the title and constant control of the power generated at the sources shall remain definitely in the people and shall not be alienated by long-term leases. This is one of those questions on which I hope we can reach an agreement.

PARKS

The development of our state-wide park and parkway system has, I think, ceased to be a matter of political controversy and will, I am confident, go forward with your assistance.

GRADE CROSSINGS

Of vital importance is the elimination of railroad crossings. I am not satisfied either with the governmental machinery or with the cooperation of some of the railroads, and I hope that we can find means to expedite the work.

PUBLIC WORKS

The policy of placing all State construction in one consolidated department of public works has been justified.

HIGHWAYS

It seems almost unnecessary for me to stress the necessity for the continuation of the present large program of highway construction and reconstruction, the building as rapidly as practical of new roads and the rebuilding of old roads, now worn out or inadequate to meet modern traffic requirements.

There is no doubt that under the present system of distribution of cost between State and counties the burden of completing the State and county highway system and bridges falls in unfair measure on the less prosperous rural communities. The fairest measure should be the actual relative wealth of each community. The whole problem, however, is so involved in the broader subject of taxes and of budget that I will present it to you at a later time.

As both major parties have in their platforms recommended that the whole cost of maintaining State and county highways should be borne by the State, the provision of law requiring towns to contribute $50 a mile for this upkeep should be repealed. This will add about $600,000 next year to the State's expense.

CANALS

The past few years have shown greater justification for the maintenance and operation of the Barge Canal, and in view of this it is incumbent on us to continue its operation at the highest possible efficiency. With the canal the State owns a number of useless or unimportant terminal properties, not located on the canal itself. Where these properties are desired by local communities for useful public purposes, this use should be made possible by proper legislation.

OTHER PUBLIC WORKS

Definite progress has been made in designing and placing under construction the liberal program of hospitals, prisons, armories, office buildings, and other public buildings, and you will, I know, recognize that the division of architecture and the division of engineering in the department of public works should be given sufficient funds to keep the program up to schedule.

AVIATION

In order to keep abreast of the times and to avoid far heavier expenditures in later years, I am convinced that the State must take steps to encourage the establishment and development of airports under a definite plan and policy. We must give official recognition to air navigation as an established means of communication and transportation.

PAYMENT FOR FUTURE IMPROVEMENTS

We need have no idle dreams that when the present program of public improvement is complete, construction by the State can cease for a dozen years to come. Neglect and lack of vision in past years made the present heavy expenditure necessary. A constantly growing population, together with new demands of civilization, will soon require still more buildings to house the wards and the business of the State, and additional expenditures to add to parks, parkways and roads, and to put unused lands to some useful purpose.

With the example before us of highly developed and successful private businesses we can properly differentiate between those improvements which should be paid for out of current State revenues and the more permanent structures built and areas developed for the use of generations to come, which should be financed by the issuing of bonds backed by the credit of the State. It is worth while to call your attention to the fact that in spite of the bonding of many public improvements during the past few years, the debt of the State of New York is far lower than that of many other States on both a per capita and an assessed valuation basis.

FOUR-YEAR TERM FOR GOVERNOR

In the plan for the reorganization of the State government one major recommendation remains unrealized. A constitutional amendment providing for the election in presidential years of a governor to serve four years met defeat at the polls by an overwhelming vote. It has been claimed by one political party that this defeat expressed opposition to the principle of the 4-year term. It was claimed by the other political party that the defeat voiced no such opinion but only a rejection of the proposal to hold the election in presidential years. We are all familiar with the arguments on both sides. It is unnecessary to repeat them here. I want to make it perfectly clear, however, that as long as nothing is done this difference of opinion will exist, and no one will ever know whether the people of this State desire the 4-year term for governor with elections coming in the year midway between presidential elections. The only way to solve this question is to submit it frankly and fairly to the people of the State. If you are unwilling to pass a new constitutional amendment, which is my recommendation, providing for the election in off years, I ask you in fairness to submit this simple question to the voters by referendum for an expression of their opinion at the next November election. That would seem to be a practical way as well as a course of good faith.

COUNTY AND TOWN GOVERNMENTS

I can see no object in being anything but frank with you in regard to the business efficiency of our system of town and county governments. In recent years our system of State government has been brought to a high level of efficiency. Why should any of us pretend any longer that our county and town governments do not require the same kind of overhauling which we have given to the affairs of the State? Even the school children know that we maintain many useless offices in our towns; that many functions now exercised by town officials should be assumed by county management; that there is an almost complete lack of budgeting; that there is an equal lack of proper auditing; and in the final analysis that the average taxpayer does not know why or where his tax money is being spent. It would be a fine thing if you and I, laying politics and partisanship aside, could take definite steps at this session of the legislature toward this reform, which everybody knows is so vitally necessary. I am confident that the public will support an honest effort on our part, for I am not enough of a cynic to believe that the public is indifferent to wasteful or outworn governing methods.

LABOR

When I consider the extraordinary progress which has been made in labor and social legislation, I am reminded of the fact that 18 years ago, when I was a member of the legislature, any person advocating a large part of the laws which have been enacted in the succeeding years would have been called a dangerous radical. That is the universal history of social progress. While much has been accomplished so far, we can not stand still, and I recommend to you the following program which I believe to be in accordance with the needs of the day:

1. A real 8-hour day and 48-hour week for women and children in industry.

2. The establishment for them of an advisory minimum or fair-wage board.

3. The extension of workmen's compensation to give its benefits to all occupational diseases.

4. The prohibiting of the granting of temporary injunctions in individual disputes without notice of hearing, and provision for trial before a jury of any alleged violations of injunctions.

5. The immediate study by a commission of experts of the subject of old-age security against want.

6. The continuation of such provisions of the emergency rent laws as are necessary.

7. Further elimination of unhealthy living conditions in the congested areas.

8. Declaration by law that the labor of a human being is not a commodity or an article of commerce.

HEALTH

While we have made and are making splendid progress in caring for the general health of our citizens, there are two specific matters in which we can lay the foundations for great public benefit.

CRIPPLES

The first of these is the care of adults and children who, through accident or disease, are so crippled in body that they are unable to lead useful and happy lives. It is estimated that at least 50,000 men, women, and children in the State of New York are thus seriously handicapped, and many of them require constant attendance on the part of some able-bodied person. As a matter of good business, it would pay the State to help in restoring these cripples to useful citizenship, and the great majority of them can, with the aid of modern medical science, be so restored. Most of them are, however, not to-day receiving adequate care or treatment for the very good reason that such treatment costs more time and money than the average family can afford.

But there is an added reason. I conceive it to be the duty of the State to give the same care to removing the physical handicaps of its citizens as it now gives to their mental development. Universal education of the mind is, after all, a modern conception. We have reached the time now when we must recognize the same obligation of the State to restore to useful activity those children and adults who have the misfortune to be crippled. I shall submit to you a carefully worked out program to initiate this much-needed care.

SARATOGA SPRINGS

The State has during recent years acquired one of the greatest gifts of nature in the whole world—the mineral springs at Saratoga. I am not satisfied that the program for their development in the past has taken sufficient account of the great benefits to mankind that can be derived from them as medicinal and therapeutic agents. We in this country are far behind Europe in the internal and external use of natural mineral springs for health purposes. The springs at Saratoga should be developed primarily for health purposes, under far more careful medical supervision than we have hitherto attempted. The physical development of the State properties at Saratoga must proceed, and I ask you to authorize the appointment of a temporary commission of scientific and medical experts, in order that a careful plan may be worked out under their advice.

EDUCATION

The principal mandatory increase in the coming budget will be the additional sum, running probably to $9,000,000, required for the extension of the better education of our citizens. The people of the State are unanimous in support of our liberal policy.

Under the present methods of apportioning State funds to rural school districts, the poorer districts in many instances fail to receive their fair share. The method of apportionment should be simplified and made to conform more closely to the relative wealth of the districts.

JUDICIAL REFORM

While I am confident that the citizens of the State demand legislation aimed to diminish crime and approve the policy of prison reform, still there are many thinking people who believe that we have not yet gone to the root of our troubles. By a long series of piecemeal enactments, covering many years, we have built up a highly complicated system of judicial procedure, both criminal and civil, which does not conform to the ideals of modern efficiency or simplicity. A growing body of our citizens complain of the complexities, of the delays, and of the costliness of private and of public litigation. I do not for a moment believe either that the situation can be greatly improved by minor amendments to the existing system, nor do I believe that a drastic reform can be accomplished in one or two years. It is time, however, that a deeper study of the whole subject should be made by a body of citizens representing the bench, the bar, and laymen. After conferring with you, I hope that I can recommend the definite initiation of this at a later time in the session.

"AMBULANCE CHASING"

One of the evils which has grown up in connection with our present administration of justice is the practice of "ambulance chasing." The appellate divisions of the first and second departments have recently conducted investigations relative to this abuse, and, I understand, will present certain legislation to your honorable bodies for the purpose of curbing such activities. I urge you to give your most earnest consideration to these recommendations.

MODERNIZATION OF INHERITANCE LAWS

A State commission composed of experienced surrogates, legislators, and lawyers has for the past two years been considering the important subject of the reform and modernization of our laws for the inheritance of real and personal property. Many of these laws have remained unchanged for over 100 years and are out of harmony with modern economic and social conditions.

The commission will make its report to you at this session of the legislature.

I approve of the commission's general recommendations for improvements, particularly those for the greater protection of women in estates and for more simplicity, economy, and expedition in estate administration. I know that this important subject will receive careful consideration by you and hope its recommendations will meet with your approval.

ELECTION LAW CHANGES

The recent election showed the need of various improvements in the election machinery, in order to take away all possibility of errors and to remove existing delays. I hope that when you pass legislation to attain this end, you will also agree to the creation of bipartisan boards of election in all counties of the State, to the limiting of campaign expenditures for all elections, and to the publication of all campaign receipts and disbursements before, as well as after, election.

CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENTS, FEDERAL AND STATE

Also, I recommend that you make a part of our fundamental law a requirement referring further amendments to the Federal Constitution to the people of the State themselves before the legislature passes on them.

I strongly favor the right of the people to initiate amendments to their own fundamental law known as the State constitution, and I ask you to submit this proposal to the voters.

SOLDIERS IN VETERANS' HOSPITALS

There are many disabled veterans of the recent war who by reason of confinement in veterans' hospitals for treatment and cure, are unable to register or vote in elections. I recommend the necessary constitutional amendments and legislative changes to enable these men to exercise their rights of suffrage as citizens.

STATE CENSUS

In the interest of common sense and elimination of waste I recommend the abolishment of the constitutional provision for a State census, and that the Federal census be used for the purposes of State apportionment.

In my inaugural address to my fellow citizens I have already pledged myself to seek no mere personal or partisan advantage in the performance of my duties as governor. I feel sure that the legislators of both parties will join me in this pledge. He best serves his party who best serves his State.

Let us all at this session rid ourselves forever of that blighting dread of following in the rear guard of another's triumphal procession along the road to better government which has too often in the past prevented any progress whatsoever. It is of small moment who first points out that road. The important thing is, having once seen the proper course, that we should turn toward it, fight for its adoption, and march shoulder to shoulder with the others toward the goal.

In conclusion may I urge you all, individually, to come to me with problems, with suggestions, with honest differences of opinion as often and as freely as I hope you will let me come to you. The verdict on our relations that I most desire from you is that I have at least been fair—and reasonable—and friendly. Let a common desire to serve our State unite us in a common friendship.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

SILVER SERVICE OF THE BATTLESHIP "LOUISIANA"

Mr. BROUSSARD. Mr. President, I report back favorably from the Committee on Naval Affairs the bill (H. R. 13404) authorizing the Secretary of the Navy, in his discretion, to deliver to the custody of the Louisiana State Museum, of the city of New Orleans, La., the silver service set in use on the battleship Louisiana, and submit a report (No. 1413) thereon. I ask that the bill be read. I shall then ask for immediate consideration.

Mr. KING. Is it a unanimous report?

Mr. BROUSSARD. It is.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will read.

The legislative clerk read the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SALE OF POST OFFICES IN GEORGIA

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD an editorial appearing in the Atlanta Constitution yesterday, the 6th of January, with reference to Federal patronage jobbing, with particular reference to the Senate investigation being carried on in that matter.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STOP IT BY LAW

Federal patronage jobbing in the South during the Republican administrations, especially in Georgia, as disclosed by the congressional investigating committee of which Senator BROOKHART, Republican, of Iowa, is chairman, has assumed such a national scandal that it takes its place along with Teapot Dome, the Forbes steal, the Miller steal, the Vare and Smith corruptions, and others of like infamy.

And yet, according to Federal District Attorney Clint Hager, who knew of the perfidious practice and sought to stop it, there is no law to inhibit this system of tribute levying or to punish the patronage auctioneers who place Federal jobs literally on the auction block.

So the situation, unthinkable in its moral if not legal culpability, is squarely at the door of Congress.

Senator BROOKHART and his associates have done valuable service in uncovering the infamy and in roundly scoring it.

Postmaster General New says the system is obnoxious and abhorrent and that his department denounces it.

And yet it has been disclosed that he was acquainted with the exactions made of a lamb who refused to be sheared and of the definite "price" that was placed upon an appointment to a small post office that paid only a meager salary at best.

He did not stop the levying of such tribute, and if he complained it did not have any effect for the scandal not only continued, but grew in its boldness, reaching a point finally where a card-index system was adopted, similar in bookkeeping to the installment plan of merchandising.

There is but one answer—that is, the enactment of a Federal law that will make such practice a felony, applicable to both the receiver and the giver of tribute for Federal jobs.

Surely Senator BROOKHART and his colleagues, disgusted as they are at the scandals their investigations disclosed, will not let the matter stop with a mere report of the facts to Congress. To do so would be little less than compounding a flagrant abuse of privilege, and Senator BROOKHART has made himself clear in his unrestrained criticisms.

Now, it is a duty he owes to the Nation, to his party, and to office-holders in every State, to carry the matter to its logical conclusion and rigidly apply the legal brakes.

Such an infamous system, if continued as it has been practiced, will tear at the very roots of popular government, and overturn every ideal of constitutional liberty, and of integrity in Federal administration.

T. L. YOUNG AND C. T. COLE

Mr. GOFF. Mr. President, I report back favorably from the Committee on the Judiciary the bill (S. 4848), for the relief of T. L. Young and C. T. Cole and submit a report thereon (No. 1414). I ask to have the bill read, and after it has been read I shall ask unanimous consent that it be considered and passed.

The amendments were, in line 5, before the word "bond," to insert "judgment recovered on the," and at the end of line 7 to strike out the period and insert a colon and the following proviso:

Provided, That the defendants, T. L. Young and C. T. Cole, pay the costs in the case of the United States against C. A. Walters et al., being case No. 2566 of the term of the district court of the United States held at Kansas City in said district beginning on the 6th day of October, 1924, and also the cost of apprehending the said C. A. Walters, said costs to be determined and certified to the Secretary of the Treasury by the Attorney General.

So as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to relieve T. L. Young and C. T. Cole from the payment of the judgment recovered on the bond for the sum representing the amount of the bond they signed as surety for C. A. Walters, who was subsequently rearrested and produced in court: Provided, That the defendants, T. L. Young and C. T. Cole, pay the costs in the case of the United States v. C. A. Walters et al., being case No. 2566 of the term of the district court of the United States held at Kansas City, in said district, beginning on the 6th day of October, 1924, and also the cost of apprehending the said C. A. Walters, said costs to be determined and certified to the Secretary of the Treasury by the Attorney General.

Mr. JONES. May I ask the Senator if this is a unanimous report?

Mr. GOFF. It is a unanimous report from the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. JONES. Has the department recommended it?

Mr. GOFF. It has. The bill was introduced by the senior Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS].

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I understand it was a bail bond that was forfeited, and the parties procured the return of the defendant, and he was subjected to the jurisdiction of the court.

Mr. GOFF. That is correct.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. And he was punished.

Mr. GOFF. He was punished, and with the exception of the costs of the arrest, which the bondsmen are agreeing to pay, this is to relieve them from the bond, to the payment of which they were subjected prior to the apprehension of the man.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I see no objection to the measure.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendments.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

REPORT OF SUPERVISING INSPECTOR GENERAL ON "VESTRIS" DISASTER

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I hold in my hand a copy of the report of the Supervising Inspector General with reference to the Vestris disaster, together with his recommendation. I think it should be printed in the RECORD and also as a Senate document. I ask that that may be done, and that the report may be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

There being no objection the report was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed as a document, and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[S. Doc. No. 191, 70th Cong., 2d sess.]

DECEMBER 10, 1928.

The honorable the SECRETARY OF COMMERCE.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: There is herewith submitted report of the result of my investigation of the loss of the steamer Vestris:

PRELIMINARY STATEMENT

When the steamship Vestris sank on November 12, I was in the sixth supervising inspection district in the Middle West, making a tour of that district, and on November 14 I talked by long-distance telephone from Memphis, Tenn., with the supervising inspector of the second district, and instructed that officer to see that the testimony of survivors who arrived in New York City was taken by the United States local inspectors at New York City. I also sent the proper telegraphic instructions to my office in Washington to direct the United States local inspectors at Norfolk, Va., to take the statements of survivors who might be brought into that port, and in those same telegraphic instructions directed that similar instructions should be given to the supervising inspector of the second district at New York. The instructions were repeated to New York because it was anticipated that most of the survivors would be brought to that place, and I wished to be doubly sure that the inspectors would understand the procedure that I desired them to take.

I left Memphis, Tenn., on the night of November 14 and arrived in the city of Washington early in the morning of November 16, and shortly after 9 o'clock on the morning of that day I conferred with you in regard to this disaster. In that conference I explained how this service proceeded in the matter of inspections of foreign ships, and the whole matter was generally discussed. I stated my intention of leaving Washington at noon of that day for New York for the purpose of taking personal charge of the investigation being conducted by this service. You approved that procedure and stated that you would send with me to New York, Gov. E. F. Morgan, Solicitor of the Department of Commerce, to advise me concerning questions of law. In company with Governor Morgan I left Washington at noon on November 16 for New York, and shortly after arrival at my hotel, Hon. Walter F. Brown, Assistant Secretary of Commerce, called, he having come there from Atlantic City, N. J., and stated that he would also assist me in the investigation.

Mr. Charles H. Tuttle, United States attorney in New York City, having already instituted fact-finding proceedings before a United States commissioner, Secretary Brown, Governor Morgan, and myself called upon that officer on November 17 and offered the assistance of the Department of Commerce. We were courteously received, and it was arranged that Mr. Tuttle should give us a transcript of the testimony taken before the United States commissioner, and the Steamboat Inspection Service should give him a copy of the testimony taken in the investigation conducted by me. Such records as were requested by Mr. Tuttle were also promptly furnished.

It was explained to Mr. Tuttle that it would be entirely agreeable to the Department of Commerce if he had a representative present to assist in the examination of witnesses, and he detailed Mr. Thomas J. Tadarelli, assistant United States attorney, for this purpose.

I started my investigation at 10 o'clock a. m., November 20, in the office of the supervising inspector of the second district, customhouse, New York City.

JURISDICTION

With certain foreign countries the United States Government has entered into reciprocal agreements for the inspection of ships under the authority of section 4400, Revised Statutes. Such a Government is that of Great Britain, and under that procedure the inspectors of the Steamboat Inspection Service would in the case of a vessel having a valid British certificate, assure themselves that the ship had on board in good condition the equipment required by her certificate. In the case of vessels flying the flags of foreign countries with which our Government does not have reciprocal inspection relations, the inspectors would in inspecting such vessels, see that they complied with the provisions of the statutes referred to in section 4400, Revised Statutes. These statutes are as follows:

Sec.	Subject
4417.	Inspection of hulls.
	Means of escape from steamers.
	Dry-dock examination.
	Air ports and deadlights.
	Lifeboat gear.
4418.	Inspection of boilers.
	Boiler-pressure test.
	Fire equipments.
	Sounding apparatus.
4421.	Certificate of inspection.
4422.	Gunpowder.
4423.	Posting of certificate.
4424.	Penalty for certain violations.
4470.	Steam pipes.
4471.	Pumps—hand pumps.
	Bilge and test hose.
4472.	Inflammable material.
	Fire alarm.
	Inflammable oils.
	Auxiliary lighting system.
4473.	Inflammable material.
4479.	Fire extinguishers.
4482.	Life preservers.
4488.	Davits.
	Motor boats.
	Lifeboats.
	Life belts.
	Ring buoys.
	Water lights.
	Line-carrying projectiles.
4496. 4497. 4499. 4500.	Penalties.

In the case of a vessel from a country with which the United States had entered into reciprocal inspection relations, and that vessel did not have a valid certificate of inspection from that country, then in that instance the inspectors would proceed to examine that vessel in the same manner as they would a vessel coming from a country with which this Government did not have reciprocal inspection relations. The Vestris was in this last class, and therefore the question would immediately arise in such a case as this as to whether the inspectors who examined this vessel had complied with the provisions of law applicable.

STATEMENT OF FACT

The steamship Vestris was a vessel of British registry of 10,494 gross tons; hull and boilers built of steel by Workman & Clark, of Belfast, Ireland, in the year 1912; owned by the Liverpool, Brazil & River Plate Steam Navigation Co. (Ltd.), of Liverpool, England; agents, Sanderson & Son, of 26 Broadway, New York, N. Y.; operated under the name of the Lamport & Holt Line.

The inspection of this vessel by this service, which was a regular inspection of a foreign steamship owing to the fact that she did not have a board of trade certificate from her home government, was made by Assistant Inspector of Hulls Edward Keane and by Assistant Inspector of Boilers Frederick L. Dennis, accompanied by Assistant Inspector of Hulls Frank N. Bruning, a recent appointee, who was assigned for the purpose of familiarizing himself with the procedure and details of inspection.

The inspection was commenced on November 2, 1928, and continued on the 3d, 5th, and 7th, a period of four days. On the 5th of November the vessel was examined in the dry dock.

The vessel having been reported to be seaworthy, a certificate of inspection was issued to her on November 8, 1928, authorizing her to navigate for a period of one year.

On November 10, 1928, at about 3.30 p. m., the vessel left Hoboken, N. J., bound for the West Indies and South American ports, at which time she had on board 127 passengers and 198 officers and crew, a total of 325. Of that number, 110 were lost through the vessel foundering at about 2.30 p. m. on November 12, when at sea approximately 200 miles off the Virginia Capes.

The cargo amounted to 2,822 tons—bunker coal, 2,790 tons, water ballast, 1,500 tons. It is understood that at one time this vessel had 250 tons of pig iron ballast placed in the bilges at the junction of Nos. 2 and 3 deep tanks (double bottoms). It is also understood that this ballast had been reduced from time to time with the intention of removing all of the fixed ballast; however, it is understood that 180 tons of this fixed ballast remained in the vessel at the time she was lost.

The water ballast was carried in tanks as follows:

65 tons in the fore peak, full.
65 tons in the after peak, full.
No. 1 tank, empty.
290 tons (salt) in No. 2 tank, full.
300 tons in No. 3 tank, full.

The mean draft of the vessel before sailing was 26 feet 10 inches.

The statements differ about the trim of the ship, some of the witnesses stating that the ship had a starboard list when she pulled out of her berth at Hoboken, while others, with more sea experience and therefore better able to judge, say that the ship was on an even keel, which was maintained until midnight of Saturday, when easterly weather set in and the wind increased, and that by 2 a. m. on Sunday the ship had a list of approximately 5° to starboard, due to the pressure of the wind on the port side of the ship. This list increased slowly during Sunday as the wind increased to a gale, and at 7.30 p. m. the ship was felt to lurch violently to starboard, at which time some of the cargo in No. 1 hold shifted, together with tables and chairs in the main dining room, and possibly coal in the cross bunkers. Previous to this the vessel is said to have rolled through an arc between an even keel and 5° to starboard, but after that time the vessel took a permanent list to starboard and rolled through an arc between 5° and 15° to starboard.

According to the testimony of the carpenter there was no change in the water in the bilges sounded by him throughout the ship, outside of the engine room and fireroom, up to his last soundings taken at 7 a. m. Monday.

According to the testimony of Chief Engineer Adams, which I think was borne out by other engineers who should know and some of the firemen, there was no great quantity of water in the bilges of the engine room and fireroom up to the middle of the forenoon of Monday, at which time the vessel was practically on her beam ends and sea water was entering the ship from many sources which would have been far above the water line had the ship been on an even keel or under an ordinary or even unusual list.

On Sunday, when the worst part of the storm prevailed, the records show that there was a heavy northeast gale with a very high sea, the wind east-northeast. This report was received through the steamer Fort Victoria as of 2.30 p. m., November 11, at latitude 37° 05′ north, longitude 71° 08′ west. Through the steamer Perene it is noted that on November 11 at noon there was a heavy northeast gale, tremendous sea, that ship pitching and rolling heavily. These two reports from vessels in the vicinity of the Vestris described what were the probable weather conditions for that ship.

LINES OF INQUIRY

As soon as this disaster occurred it was clear to me that the responsibility rested squarely upon the shoulders of this service as to the inspection of this vessel, and I stated then, and I state now, that this service has no alibi. Either its inspectors properly inspected the steamer Vestris or they did not, and hence the question immediately arises, first, as to whether the vessel was properly inspected; second, what caused the disaster to the ship with consequent loss of life; and, third, what are the lessons to be learned from this disaster, because from every disaster there are lessons to be learned that should enable us to take such action as may be necessary to prevent a recurrence. These are the three lines of inquiry that I followed, and I shall now proceed to discuss these three subjects in their order.

INSPECTION OF THE "VESTRIS"

The very first consideration in regard to the functioning of the inspectors is the matter of their personal conduct, and therefore, when I received a letter, which I had no doubt was anonymous, alleging intemperate habits on the part of Inspector Keane and Inspector Dennis, I immediately made that letter the subject of searching inquiry of all three of the inspectors who were on board the Vestris. The testimony taken will show clearly that no one of these three inspectors partook of any intoxicating liquor when on board the Vestris making the examination required by law. In fact, Inspector Keane stated that he was a total abstainer. All three inspectors denied having taken any intoxicating liquor. Inspector Keane stated that he had eaten lunch one day when he was on board the Vestris. Inspector Bruning had eaten no lunch on any day, and Inspector Dennis stated that he had lunch one day. Of course, the inference that might be drawn from the fact that any of these inspectors had eaten lunch on board the Vestris would be that their inspection had been affected by the fact that they had received this free meal, but it is only necessary to point out to any one familiar with shipping that here we have an instance of inspectors in their overalls and noon arrives when they are accustomed to eating their luncheon. They, undoubtedly with a view to accomplishing as much as possible in the matter of the work of inspection, ate lunch on board so they would not have to change from their overalls to their street clothing, leave the ship, buy their lunch, and then return, all of which would take up all of an hour. At the same time, however, not because there was anything inherently wrong in having done this, but because inspectors must avoid the very appearance of any conduct that would invite criticism, no matter how unjust, my office will take proper steps to see that hereafter no inspector eats any meals on any steamer, unless he pays for the same. It would not be practicable to say that an inspector should never buy a meal upon a ship, because to do so would at times seriously interfere with the efficient functioning of the service, as for example, when inspectors are on board steamers counting passengers when vessels are under way. Under such circumstances, it will be necessary for an inspector to eat, but then never gratis.

So far as the drinking of intoxicating liquor is concerned, it is something that everyone knows to be true that there is liquor to be had in the seaports of this country, and it is presumed that some of this liquor comes in on board ships. I know that so far as the inspectors of this service are concerned they are a body of men who are temperate in habit.

In this connection it is proper to give, and the same is set forth in detail below, the history of the service of each of these inspectors:

Edward Keane, appointed August 24, 1911, as assistant inspector of hulls at New York, N. Y.

Frederick L. Dennis, appointed June 3, 1893, as assistant inspector of boilers at New London, Conn.; promoted July 10, 1895, to position of local inspector of boilers at New Haven, Conn.; transferred June 17, 1917, to position of assistant inspector of boilers at New York, N. Y.

Frank N. Bruning, appointed October 10, 1928, as assistant inspector of hulls at New York, N. Y.

In order that it may be seen the detail in which an inspector of hulls proceeds when examining a foreign ship of the Vestris class, there will be found below in tabulated form the questions that are contained in book form 991 A, Hull Inspector's Report of Inspection of Foreign Steamer:

REMARKS

The thing that requires explanation first in regard to the examination of the hull of the Vestris by Inspector Keane is the matter of the coal ports. Considerable has been said and written about these coal ports and about the half door, and the impression seems to have been given that these coal ports and half door may not have been properly examined by the inspectors and by Inspector Keane in particular.

There were 7 of these coal ports on either side of the steamer Vestris, making 14 in all, and there were 2 of these half doors, 1 on either side of the ship. These half doors Inspector Keane states were examined by him, and he further stated under oath that he did go into the bunkers and with his flashlight examined as many of the doors of the coal ports as were accessible. Some of these doors were not accessible because there was some coal against them. Immediately the question may be asked as to whether he had proceeded properly in this respect, because inferentially, without understanding the construction of the ship, the impression has been given that the distress of the Vestris was caused possibly by these coal ports and by the half doors. Let us assume for argument's sake that the inspector had required that every one of the coal ports be opened. Having caused these ports to be opened, what would he have found? After the ports were open and he had looked at them in their open condition, it is to be remembered that the closing of these doors and the calking of the same is not a responsibility that rests upon the inspector. That is a matter of ship operation, and it is the custom for the carpenter of the ship to close those ports and calk them after the coal is in. If, therefore, these coal ports had been perfectly calked, and the inspector had caused them to be opened and afterwards they were not properly closed and calked, there can be no dereliction charged to the inspector, but to that employee of the ship who is responsible for the closing and the calking of the ports. The same thing may be said with reference to the half doors.

Furthermore, the inspector examined these coal ports also externally when the ship was on the dry dock. Furthermore, the bottom of these coal ports was 11 feet above the mean draft of the vessel on departure, and the bottom of the half doors was 6 feet and some inches above the mean draft—loaded draft of the vessel when she sailed from New York. So that it will be seen that so far as any difficulty that the ship may have experienced from these openings, if in fact she experienced any, that condition would not have appeared until, in the case of the half door, the vessel was listed 13°, and in the case of the coal ports, the vessel was listed 19°.

The next feature in regard to the hull inspection which relates to Inspector Keane has to do with the matter of the examination of the lifeboats. The lifeboats on the steamer Vestris were of wood clinker-built construction, and it is known to all persons familiar with ship operation that when a wooden lifeboat is first placed in the water there is some water that comes through the seams. These seams, however, take up in a reasonable time, and there are many seafaring folk who prefer a wooden lifeboat to a metallic one.

The evidence shows that these wooden lifeboats were carefully examined by the hull inspectors who were on board the Vestris for that purpose. The boats had been lifted clear of the chocks and careful external examination was made. A careful examination was also made internally and with particular reference to the equipment that these boats are required to carry. The evidence showed that in one boat—that is to say, lifeboat No. 8—there was a hole in the same, and the impression seems to have been given that the presence of that hole was apparently there when the inspectors examined the ship, and which would indicate if the hole was not discovered, that the examination of the lifeboats had been made in a perfunctory manner.

In my investigation I gave particular attention to developing evidence in regard to that hole, and when it is considered that that boat was on the port side of the ship, and on which side, which was the high side, it was difficult to get the lifeboats off, and where oars and boat hooks were used to keep the lifeboats away from the side of the ship, it is easy to be seen that the boats could have been and probably were damaged in this effort. There is even testimony to show by one witness, a very intelligent gentleman, that while he believed that the hole was an old one he could not swear to that fact, and finally there is evidence to show that the splinters in that hole protruded inwardly into the body of the boat. This last fact was testified to by Mr. Carl Schmidt, a passenger, and Mr. Gerald Burton, leading fireman on the Vestris, testified in his direct examination that the boat was damaged by being bilged on the side of the ship. Furthermore, it is to be remembered that there was a considerable sea when these boats were launched, and undoubtedly they shipped considerable water. Again, it should not be overlooked that it is possible and even probable, in view of the lack of discipline that is known to have existed in other respects, that the matter of putting the plugs in the drain holes in the bottom of the boats was overlooked. These plug holes are 1 inch in diameter, one in each end of the boat about directly under the end thwarts. Each hole was supplied with three metal-bound cork plugs fitted on chains for plugging said holes. The purpose of these drain holes is to keep the lifeboat free of water that might accumulate from rain, moisture, or the sea while on board the ship. The plugs should be inserted in the holes before the lifeboat is launched. So far as equipment in the boats is concerned, it is easy to understand how the equipment could be lost out of the boats incident to the handling of the same under the conditions that prevailed when an effort was made to launch these boats on the Vestris.

A very important question that the inspector is required to answer is with reference to whether every lifeboat is lowered to the water or to the wharf and lifted clear of water or wharf with boat loaded to allowed capacity. Inspector Keane answered that question with the one word "Yes," and failed to write on blank page 11 of Form 991 A opposite that question the fact that the lifeboats had not been actually lowered to the water. He should have answered that question "No," because the fact is that he did not lower the boats to the water or to the wharf and lift them clear of water or wharf loaded to allowed capacity. He should have written on blank page 11 of Form 991 A opposite that question the fact that the lifeboats had not been actually lowered to the water. He should have written on page 11 the fact that it was not possible to lower these boats, because the ship was alongside the dock and on one side the roof of the shed of the dock interfered and on the other side lighters interfered. He should have shown on page 11 that what he actually did was to swing the boats and test them in this condition with the required weight. The inspector actually did what he considered was equivalent to the requirement in Form 991 A, but he should have given the correct statement of facts in answer to the question.

So far as these lifeboats are concerned and the necessity of bailing, that was a condition that arose probably from the failure to insert the plugs in the boats and from the sea that was running at that time. Yet it is to be remembered that the testimony of the officers of the American Shipper that picked up the passengers of five of these lifeboats is to the effect that after having cast these boats adrift, and after having cruised around in the vicinity where these passengers were picked up for a period of not less than two hours, those lifeboats were still floating without anyone to bail them. Further, it is to be recorded that the officers of the American Shipper testified that when these lifeboats came alongside they were floating with considerable freeboard and no one bailing.

Following is a statement of what happened to each of the 14 lifeboats on the steamer Vestris:

Lifeboat No. 1. Picked up by S. S. American Shipper.
Lifeboat No. 2. Sank with the ship.

Lifeboat No. 10. Picked up by the S. S. American Shipper.
Lifeboat No. 11. Picked up by the S. S. Myriam.
Lifeboat No. 12. Sank with the ship.
Lifeboat No. 13. Picked up by the S. S. Berlin.

With reference to the life preservers on the steamer, it may be pointed out that there were 691 cork life preservers for adults passed at this inspection. There were 4 extra life preservers. There were 70 life preservers for children. There were 68 life preservers that were condemned. It is proper to point out also that there were people who were in the water as long as 19 hours supported by these life preservers. I have observed that the Navy captain of the battleship Wyoming, in his testimony before the United States commissioner, had some comment to make about the life preservers and remarked that there were some bodies floating face downwards. His idea, too, was that life preservers should be probably of the naval type, the thought being that as a result of life preservers constructed according to the naval pattern a person's head would be held up in the event of the person losing consciousness.

Concerning this whole matter of life preservers, it may be stated that there is considerable argument to be advanced on both sides. In the first place, there are factors to be considered other than the one of a person's head being held upward. The naval life preservers are made of kapoc and it is true that, under the rules and regulations prescribed by the Board of Supervising Inspectors, kapoc life preservers may be passed by inspectors. I believe it is also true that aside from kapoc life preservers being used in the United States Navy, such life preservers are also used on the ships of leading maritime countries. As a matter of practice, in the American merchant marine, the kind of life preservers used are very largely of cork, and so far as I am advised at the present time there are not many kapoc life preservers being manufactured for use on vessels of the American merchant marine. While it is true that there are rules that have been carefully drawn out not only by the Board of Supervising Inspectors but by the Navy Department concerning the inspection of kapoc life preservers, there is a considerable question in my own mind as to whether a kapoc life preserver is really as reliable as a cork life preserver. It may all be true that a kapoc life preserver is light and soft and easily adjustable to the body, but it is known that kapoc may be an uncertain quantity. There is kapoc that comes from certain places that has practically no lasting buoyancy, and there is kapoc that comes from other places that has a lasting buoyancy, but when all factors are considered, cork is undoubtedly more reliable than kapoc in my opinion.

The British have given careful attention to this matter of life preservers and especially to the feature of a life preserver that will keep the head up, but there are life preservers of British make that, while the head is kept up, the body will float lower in the water than the body of a person in an American life preserver, so that in the event of a heavy sea as would frequently be encountered on the ocean, a person in such a life preserver while floating might nevertheless be considerably distressed, if not actually drowned, when in an American life preserver he would be considerably safer. It is not to be denied that the feature of keeping the head up is an important one, but it is not the only one that is to be borne in mind in the manufacture of life preservers. Further, with reference to British life preservers of the type concerning which I have been speaking, that is to say, life preservers that have the buoyancy entirely under the chin and back of the head, I have been advised by a British ship's officer that he had seen bodies in the water during the late war floating face downward. It is also a question whether, in the case of the British life preservers of such types as I have referred to, a person might not be in a very dangerous situation if he attempted to jump from any height. So far as collars on life preservers are concerned, they are, under American practice to-day, permitted but not required.

This question of life preservers is one that has been gone into carefully by the Board of Supervising Inspectors, and it is one concerning which it has no pride of opinion; and in view of the able source of the observation in regard to these life preservers, this is a matter that will be again carefully considered by the Board of Supervising Inspectors at its next annual meeting.

With reference to the inspection of the boilers of the steamer Vestris, there seems to have been no question raised, and therefore there is no necessity of going into further detail in regard to that part of the examination of the ship.

In conclusion, as a result of a study of the testimony taken at this hearing as well as at the hearing before the United States commissioner, it is my opinion that the inspection of the Vestris itself and its life-saving apparatus and equipment was thorough and complete, in accordance with the practice that has been followed for many years in the inspection of vessels. No doubt the practice of inspection can be improved. Specific recommendations to that end, some of which require additional personnel and changes in existing law, are submitted below. The inspection was made by men who are able, experienced, and conscientious, and it is only fair to the service to state that there was no evidence at the hearing that the loss of life was due in any degree to failure of the inspectors in the performance of their duty.

CAUSE OF THE DISASTER AND CONSEQUENT LOSS OF LIFE

When this investigation commenced there was considerable prominence given by the press to the coal ports and to the half door on the starboard side of the ship. As it proceeded, however, there came in my mind more and more a doubt as to whether the difficulty was occasioned primarily by anything that might have happened to the coal ports or to the half door, and by the time this inquiry had concluded I was persuaded that the initial list of the ship was not due to water that came in from those openings. In order, however, to be accurately informed from first-hand information, I did on December 3 in company with the supervising inspector of the second district visit the steamer Vauban of the Lamport & Holt Line, which steamer is constructed identically as the Vestris, except that the Vestris was an Isherwood ship and the Vauban is not.

The difference between the Isherwood type of construction as compared with the ordinary or transverse type of ship is that in the Isherwood construction, instead of numerous closely spaced transverse frames with a few longitudinal stringers, keelsons, and intercostals, the transverse frames consist of heavy web frames spaced a considerable distance apart (approximately 12 feet, varying to some extent on different sizes and types of vessels). They extend across under deck forming a belt around the vessel, their strength being equal to that required of the combined number of transverse frames fitted in the ordinary type of construction. These web frames or girders are slotted at outer edges to allow the continuation of the longitudinal stiffeners which are riveted to the shell plating. These longitudinals are closely spaced, and on the bottom or floor of the vessel a number of them have a heavy web forming the keelsons. The effect of these numerous longitudinals is to give a greater support to the shell of the vessel longitudinally and eliminate to some extent vibration and the tendency of vessel to work in a seaway.

An examination of the Vauban proved beyond doubt that whatever may have happened so far as the entry of sea water into the Vestris from the coal ports or from the half door is concerned did not happen at first. When the ship was listed 13° and upwards, the matter of the amount of the water that would enter through the half doors and ports would become a factor, just as also would the water that would enter through the scuppers also become a factor at that time; but we must look to some other place than these openings for an explanation of that permanent list of less than 13°. It could not have been the water in the bilges. Soundings failed to show water in the holds. There still remains, therefore, the question of what caused that first permanent list of up to about 15° and which list became greater.

It is apparent that this vessel had very little, if any, positive metacentric height when leaving port. That is to say, the vertical center of gravity of the vessel must have been very near or above the point of transverse metacenter, which would cause a negative ship. It has been noted that no liquid ballast was used in No. 1 double bottom. This being a fact added materially to this negative condition. It has also been noted that No. 5 double bottom was not full, which would create what is termed a "loose-water" condition in that tank, and this, together with loose water that may have prevailed in other tanks not hardened up, cause a free-surface condition and thereby increase the negative condition of ship. This, together with the wind pressure on the port side previously referred to, would give the vessel its first permanent list. It has also been pointed out that attempt was made to correct this permanent list by pumping water from the starboard double bottoms. Reference has been made to tanks Nos. 2, 4, and 5. This in turn further increased the negative condition of the ship, therefore further increased the list to the first noticeable 13° to 15°. At this position the outer edge starboard side of the upper 'tween deck would be at or slightly below the water line of the sea. This deck is fitted with scuppers in the coal bunkers, passageways, toilets, wash rooms, etc. Said scuppers lead from the outer edges of the deck, pass down through the deck and out through the ship's side to open sea. The vessel with this 13° to 15° list put these scuppers entirely under water. It is probable that these scuppers were not plugged—that is to say, if they were equipped with clapper valves, the valves did not close—which allowed an open passage for the sea to pass into the coal bunkers, passageways, and what not. As the list increased the pressure and the amount of water coming into the ship increased. This condition continued with increasing list and increasing amount of water.

In addition to this list caused by wind, free surface and water entering through scuppers, the pumping of tanks Nos. 2, 4, and 5 would, until the tanks were entirely pumped, create further conditions of free surface. This free-surface condition together with the body of the water to one side, causing upsetting moment, all helped to increase the negative conditions of the stability of the ship. Of course, these observations in regard to the stability of the ship must at the present time in large measure rest upon supposition that is based upon such data as is at present available, and when further data are obtained, as they will be, the matter of calculating exactly the stability of the ship will be simplified, and will be exact.

There are some other facts also to be borne in mind in connection with this question of stability. We know that during the storm of Sunday the vessel was listed to starboard, and sea water to some extent may have entered the starboard bunker through a damaged or broken scupper pipe or sanitary discharge pipe from one of the toilets. There were two of these sanitary discharge pipes in the bunker space; one led out through the starboard side of the ship, the other through the port side.

It is possible also that one or more rivet holes in the case of rivets sheared through stress during bad weather, or a rupture in the shell plating from the same cause, may have allowed water to enter from the sea. However, it is much more likely that the water entered the starboard bunker through a broken scupper or sanitary pipe. In the case of a break in the sanitary pipes, the water circulating in the sanitary system, or part of it, would be dumped in the bunker, and would find its way to the starboard side from either of these pipes on account of the list to starboard. It will be remembered that one of the scupper pipes did break in the engine-room space Sunday afternoon, and if that happened, it is entirely possible that the same may have happened also in the bunkers. This water was, of course, taken up by the bituminous coal which is said to have been for the most part slack, and which would have resulted in increasing the list to starboard. Little of the water reached the fireroom bilges until the coal became thoroughly saturated. If the water had reached the fireroom bilges immediately the ship's pumps could have discharged it overboard

As the keel to starboard increased the quantity of water entering the ship increased, and at some time between 11 a. m. and 12 noon on Monday it became apparent that the pumps would not be able to control the water entering the fireroom section of the ship, partly on account of reduced steam pressure owing to difficulties of firing the boilers due to the heavy starboard list, which had become so great that it is not believed the pumps could have controlled the inrush much longer even if full steam pressure could have been maintained.

We know from the record that at 7.30 Sunday evening the ship came into violent contact probably with the sea, possibly with a derelict. I think that more probably it was due to the sea, and at that time one witness testified that there was a loud crashing sound and the ship vibrated violently for three-quarters of a minute. It is known that 10 tons of cargo shifted in No. 1 hold, and it is entirely possible that other cargo shifted in the other holds at that time. It is also possible that the coal shifted at the same time, and all of these factors together would tend to explain the permanent list of the ship after that time.

Now, when it was seen that the ship was doomed, the master was forced to use his next line of defense. As to the use of wireless, subsequent events have shown that he delayed too long sending out the S O S call. He had now only the boats upon which to depend. Some of the boats on the port side, the high side, the weather side of the ship, were gotten away with difficulty because of the list of the ship, the boats coming into contact with the side of the ship, and in some instances resting upon the side of the ship as the list increased. Five boats were gotten away from the starboard side of the ship, but no systematic effort was made to get the passengers into these boats. The reason given is the list and the difficulty of getting the passengers across the deck, but there was evident through all of this period the absence of a strong directing hand, and it is this absence of discipline at this time that explains the immediate cause of the large loss of life in this disaster. Some reference has been made to the releasing gear failing to function, but it is reasonable also to suppose with the lack of discipline that was apparent at this time that the crew apparently were entirely unfamiliar with the use of the gear.

LESSONS TO BE LEARNED FROM THE DISASTER

The thing that stands out most prominently in this disaster and the lesson first to be learned is that we must hereafter stress men more than things. In this modern age we are prone to direct our efforts as far as possible toward the invention of mechanical devices that will make things safer, and this is true not only on ships but also on shore. As a result of it, I fear that we have come to unconsciously become the slaves of these things that we have invented to help us, foregetting that no matter how excellent a device there may be, there must be competent men to handle it, and this competency in men must be stressed at sea more than in any other place.

Without desiring to unnecessarily reflect upon the officers of the Vestris, it must be apparent to anyone with an open mind and approaching this disaster in a detached manner, that the officers of this ship do not seem to measure up to the standard that we would expect to be present in a British ship. We must have in mind, therefore, so far as the Steamboat Inspection Service is concerned, that first of all we must insist upon competent officers. We undertake to do this by requiring certain experience of all ships' officers before license may be obtained, and in addition, we undertake by written examinations to determine whether these officers are properly prepared to have issued to them licenses by the United States Government. In this British ship the Steamboat Inspection Service had no control over these ship's officers, but we are concerned as Americans in being sure that the officers of American ships shall be equal to such an emergency as confronted the officers of the steamer Vestris. In this connection, I may state that during the last 10 years marked improvement has been made in raising the standard of examination questions used by the local inspectors. This has been done by advice of the office of the Supervising Inspector General, and at present that office is engaged in the preparation of difficult questions of high standard.

It is manifest that the members of the crew of the Vestris were not well trained in lifeboat drill. In this country, so far as the issuance of certificates to lifeboatmen is concerned, those certificates are issued as a result of an actual practical examination of the applicant. So far as the issuance of able seamen certificates is concerned, those certificates are issued upon statements of experience that are made in affidavit form by the persons desiring to be able seamen. I do not argue that there should be no experience required for able seamen, but I do submit that in addition to the experience that is required, there should be an actual practical examination of able seamen conducted by inspectors of this service. It has been alleged that there has been much fraud in the handling of these able seamen certificates, and beyond doubt that is true, but that is not due to the service. It is due to the law, for where there is a law that requires the issuance of a certificate as important as an able seaman certificate, the issuance of that certificate based entirely upon a statement of experience, it is easy to see that fraud can easily be practiced by the applicant. The office of the Supervising Inspector General contains correspondence showing the efforts that have been made to apprehend these offenders, but the surest way to prevent this and to improve the standard would be by actual examination by the inspectors.

In connection with the loss of the Vestris, where it is evident that it was not possible to get all of the lifeboats clear of the ship, it is easy to see that those persons who believe in the increasing use of rafts would advance the argument that there should be more rafts supplied. In that connection permit me to say that so far as the use of boats is concerned, I would not be in favor of changing the rule of boats for all, but so far as the use of additional buoyant apparatus is concerned, I may state that the British have in their suggestions for the international conference that is to be held in London next spring included the use of additional buoyancy to the extent of 25 per cent of the people on board in addition to the lifeboats that are carried.

That suggestion by the British has been favorably met by the American committee that is preparing for the international conference, and it may be that as a result of the loss of the Vestris that percentage might be raised. This additional buoyancy would not be in the form of the catamaran rafts usually used in this country, but of an entirely different form of raft buoyancy, the purpose of such buoyancy being to take care of persons temporarily as best may be under probable conditions similar to those that were present in the case of the loss of the Vestris.

Encourage manufacturers in the lifeboat art to develop improved devices for launching lifeboats, particularly from vessels which are listed over.

I have referred in another part of this report to the suggestion of the commanding officer of the battleship Wyoming in regard to life preservers, and only take time at this place to again state that this is a matter that will be considered by the Board of Supervising Inspectors at its next annual meeting.

With regard to the inspection of lifeboats, I have pointed out in detail how lifeboats are inspected and the manner in which wooden lifeboats may be expected to act when first put into the water, but the question may well be asked as to whether granting that wooden lifeboats do take up in places where they leak, whether they take up sufficiently rapidly to be a safe boat, and my thought in that respect is that in the inspections that are hereafter made of wooden lifeboats, the test might be made with water in the boats. The water could be used as the weight required, and it could be also required that it remain in the boats for a certain length of time, and if at the end of that time the boats were not tight and they still leaked, then those lifeboats could be rejected.

Also in connection with the inspection of foreign ships and of the life-saving equipment of these ships in particular—and I refer now to those foreign ships that are not examined under reciprocal agreements—it might be well to increase the number of inspections; that is to say, have three reinspections during the year as well as the annual inspection that is now required. At present in the case of ferry steamers and excursion steamers three reinspections are required in addition to the annual inspection that is required by law. It is, of course, to be understood that if this be done it will be necessary to have more inspectors.

Again, in connection with the inspection of lifeboats, the inspectors have been up against the condition, especially in the crowded port of New York, of not being able to lower all of the lifeboats. They have lowered to the extent they were able. It would be very desirable to work out a plan by which all of these boats could be lowered and yet not at the same time unnecessarily interfere with the sailings of the ships. While as a matter merely of the use of words it might be stressed that regardless of what the physical conditions are time should be taken to lower the boats, yet it soon would be found if this were insisted upon under all conditions, without any consideration of the conditions existing in some of the ports, the inspectors would very soon be accused of being reactionary, unprogressive, and undertaking to add burdens to the American merchant marine. Increasingly, however, it is evident that in the matter of the lifeboat drills the service must insist upon more than a mere entry in the log, and these drills must increasingly be held frequently under the personal direction of the inspectors of this service. To do that requires more inspectors.

I have referred to the criticism made of the releasing hooks in use on the Vestris, and in that connection I may state that during the past year there has been a careful study made of releasing hooks, the matter to be considered at the next meeting of the Board of Supervising Inspectors. In that connection a letter under date of April 10, 1928, reading as follows, was sent to each supervising inspector:

"You will recall the correspondence that was before the Board of Supervising Inspectors at its recent session in connection with allegations made that there were lifeboat releasing gears that had been approved by the Board of Supervising Inspectors that were inefficient for the purpose intended and concerning which allegations this office is making an investigation. Although the allegations have been made, and apparently in good faith, up to the present time this office has received nothing to substantiate them, and therefore, in order that we may proceed further, it will be necessary to conduct an investigation with reference to all releasing gears in use.

"In view of the above you will issue the necessary instructions to the boards of local inspectors in your district in making annual inspections of passenger vessels to make a careful test of all lifeboat releasing gears found on such vessels, with a view to ascertaining whether or not they are efficient and fulfill the requirements of the law. In case they are found defective in their operation they should ascertain whether or not such defective operation can be corrected by adjustment of their working parts. This procedure should be followed until we have ascertained fully the kind of releasing gears on all passenger vessels coming under the jurisdiction of this service.

"You will also instruct them to, on November 15, 1928, submit to you a detailed report in triplicate, setting forth by trade names all gears found, showing the manufacturer by name and address and year of manufacture of gear, the vessels using such gears to be alphabetically arranged under the different kinds of gears, showing date of inspection and whether gear operated satisfactorily or otherwise, and if not satisfactorily to what extent it failed in the test. In a word, to give a report that will show exactly the kinds of gears installed, those that functioned satisfactorily, and more especially gears that failed, to the end that you may forward that report to the bureau in duplicate by not later than December 1 so that the bureau may consider the information obtained and be in a position to submit it to the Board of Supervising Inspectors, with a view to determining just what policy shall be pursued in the testing of gears that have failed, in the elimination of gears that have been approved but which have not been manufactured, etc., all with a view to purging the list of releasing gears approved for use on vessels coming under the jurisdiction of this service, so that the claim can not be made that we are permitting the use of inefficient and antiquated releasing gears."

Undoubtedly as a result of those letters the Board of Supervising Inspectors will undertake to test out again all the gear that has been approved during the years that have passed.

The question that must be uppermost in the minds of all men who are familiar with ships, so far as concerns the steamer Vestris, is that of stability. The whole thing revolves primarily about this question. So far as inclining ships is concerned, it may be pointed out that the United States Steamboat Inspection Service, as an arm of the United States Government, is the first organization of its kind in the world, and for a number of years, to have undertaken the inclining of merchant ships. Only recently has the British Government given attention to this matter, and I know of no other maritime nation that gives attention to it as a governmental function. Stability tests were first required by the General Rules and Regulations of the Board of Supervising Inspectors after the capsizing of the steamer Eastland in the Chicago River. I may also state that while the subject of stability was not included among those subjects to be discussed at the international conference in London next spring, Admiral Rock, chairman of the ship construction committee of the special American committees that are preparing for this conference, made the motion and I seconded it, to have stability added to the agenda to be discussed at that conference. In this connection, the question may be asked as to why this matter of stability has not received governmental attention from other nations the same as ours. It may also be asked as to why a standard has not been adopted in the premises, and in that respect, I may say that so far as stability is concerned, doctors disagree. There is a school of naval architects that believes in one thing in regard to stability and another school that believes in another, and the difficulty has been to get a point of departure that would be a standard that could be subscribed to by the maritime nations.

So far as the work in this country is concerned, I may point out that only recently and after much research has a special committee of the American marine standards committee arrived at a tentative standard with reference to stability, and that proposed standard is now being prepared to be sent not only to leading interests in this country but to the leading nations of the world. So far as the stability work of the Steamboat Inspection Service as it relates to American vessels is concerned, that is a positive thing that has been going forward for a number of years, but so far as the application of those rules to foreign ships is concerned, there immediately arises international questions that must be given consideration. If it be argued that these reciprocal agreements that our Government has entered into with foreign nations should be denounced and we should undertake to inspect foreign ships in all respects the same as American ships, then I answer that the intolerable conditions that arose as the result of that procedure are the very conditions that brought about the reciprocity that exists between leading nations, and in which reciprocity American ships have as much to gain as foreign ships. It seems to me that so far as foreign ships are concerned, that the way to meet this situation is not necessarily by radical action, but by proper discussion in conference between the best minds of the leading maritime nations of the world.

The proper way to approach this whole matter of hull inspection is through the front door and not through the back. In the case of boiler inspection we require that the design of a boiler shall first be passed upon by the service, the material subject to tensile strain which is used in the construction of the boiler is tested by an inspector of the service, and finally annually the completed boiler is given a thorough internal and external examination and submitted to hydrostatic pressure. Is it not reasonable to also hold that in approaching this proposition of hull inspection we should start before the hull is built as well as after the hull is built? But what we really do is to permit a ship to be built, subject her to a stability test, and then calculate as to whether the ship has proper stability.

We would not do this in the case of the construction of a building on land; such procedure would be considered absurd. It would not be considered reasonable to permit a man to build a building worth several millions of dollars, and then calmly tell him that that building was not safe. What is done is that the building inspectors pass upon those buildings before they are constructed, and if that reasonable action is used in regard to the construction of structures on land, why is it not just as reasonable and just as logical to follow the same procedure in regard to the construction of ships? Why should we use logical methods of approaching a situation on land, and then, because we have to deal with ships, undertake to throw aside all logic and follow the methods of past generations? If reference be made to the report of the Supervising Inspector General for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1915, it will be noted that the idea which the bureau then had in mind was to create in the Office of the Supervising Inspector General a corps of experts whose business it would be to approve proposed hull construction. Again, if reference be made to the report of the Supervising Inspector General for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1927, it will be noted on pages 1, 2, and 3 a suggestion made by that officer that reference to a reorganization in such manner as to provide a technical staff.

Another lesson to be learned from the loss of the Vestris is that wireless should be required on all ships navigating the ocean or the coasts. Had such a law been in effect it is probable that everybody on board the Vestris might have been saved, because there was a ship within as near as 45 miles of the Vestris, but not equipped with wireless, that could have gone to her assistance.

It would seem that all openings through the shell plating of ships, such as cargo ports, coal ports, scuppers, discharge pipes of all kinds, including ash ejectors and sea cocks and their chests, should have special attention at each annual inspection, and as far as practically possible, access should be had to them at any time, whether in port, at sea, loaded or light, and scuppers from any deck below a weather deck should lead to the bilges where the water could be handled by pumps.

In new construction, it may be well to require centrifugal pumps of large capacity installed to pump out of the the fire and engine room bilges, or have bilge connections installed from the circulating pump or pumps to bilges as above.

In all of this tragedy there is an important factor that does not appear upon the printed page, and that is the matter of salvage, a question concerning which this service has no control or jurisdiction, but one that is vitally wrapped up in the matter of safety of ships. Captain Carey is gone. No man is able to say what his mental processes were in his hour of trial, but any man who is familiar with the law of the sea knows that he, Captain Carey, or any other shipmaster, would very carefully consider the sending of an S O S that would result in the salving of his ship, should it not be absolutely necessary to send out that call. There is a human thing here that must not be overlooked, and that is the professional pride of the master of the ship. Could he be sure that the ship could be saved by his own efforts, he would make every effort to do so before asking for help, and he did make every effort that he could. If the amount of salvage that could be claimed by vessels responding to such a call was reduced, the master of a ship in distress would not hesitate too long before asking for help.

If it be claimed that if salvage is reduced, masters of other ships would not respond as promptly as they should, I answer that in this day of wireless communication, when the positions of ships are so well known, it would be easy to place the responsibility upon a shipmaster who refused to respond, and who, refusing, should have visited upon him the severest penalty. Of course, the matter of what salvage shall be paid is something that very properly could be determined by an international conference, at which would be present representatives of the leading maritime nations.

Another thing that might well receive attention is that of liability. We speak of limitation of liability, so far as ships are concerned, as something that necessarily must exist, but when we do so we forget that the conditions under which such doctrines of admiralty have grown up have completely changed. In this modern day, when ships can be and are so largely directed from home offices, it might be well to give attention to the proposition of unlimited liability upon this kind of property. The point is that increasingly the effort is made in governmental affairs to take all responsibility, and so far as the Steamboat Inspection Service is concerned it must be remembered that it is not a service that operates ships. By giving attention to this matter of unlimited liability there would be a responsibility placed more squarely upon the owners, and they would not be prone to look so much to the responsibility of the Government. If it be contended that to impose such law upon American shipowners would be to penalize them—and it would—then that also is a question that would have to be adjusted in a proper international conference.

RECESS

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, as in open executive session, I move that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock noon to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock p. m.) the Senate, in open executive session, took a recess until to-morrow, Tuesday, January 8, 1929, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

MONDAY, January 7, 1929

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O God of the ages, Thou who are infinite in love, in wisdom, and far too wonderful for human understanding—every noble task completed enlarges the soul of the doer and increases the joy of the world. As partakers of the divine nature, suffer us not to fail because of inherited tendencies, acquired vices, or evil habits. We believe that it is a consummation of an eternal plan to bring together all things in Thee! Oh, may our souls burst in gladness and praise before the purpose and the abundance of our God. Take our powers unemployed, our ideals unfulfilled, and our possibilities unachieved and let them exult with rapture in the heavenly delights of soul and sense. Be with all weary hearts and travelers who are on the hard, hard road; keep them until they reach the hilltop of eternity's morning. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Craven, its principal clerk, announced that the Senate had passed a concurrent resolution of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House is requested:

S. Con. Res. 28. Concurrent resolution relating to the election of President and Vice President of the United States.

EDITORIAL FROM THE COLUMBUS DAILY TELEGRAM WRITTEN BY HON. EDGAR HOWARD, OF NEBRASKA

Mr. BUSBY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for one moment.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BUSBY. Mr. Speaker, there has come to my hands a very unusual editorial written by one of the Members of this House on the live subject of farming. It is a nonpartisan editorial, it deals in a frank and very fair way with the subject. It is so unusual in its merits that I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks by incorporating this editorial as a part of my remarks.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Speaker, I did not quite hear the gentleman.

Mr. BUSBY. The editorial is written by a Member of the House, and signed by a Member of the House, and I desire to extend my remarks by incorporating it in them.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BUSBY. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Columbus Daily Telegram of Columbus, Nebr., on the subject of farming, written by Hon. EDGAR HOWARD, a Representative from the State of Nebraska:

[From the Columbus (Nebr.) Daily Telegram]

WATCHMAN, WHAT OF THE YEAR

I am trying now most particularly to discover what the year shall have in store for those who have for long years been hoping, dreaming, and working for Federal legislation to insure a square deal for the American farm.

It now seems assured that some sort of farm legislation will be accomplished in 1929, either during the present session of the Congress or at a special session to be called by President Hoover. But when I know that such legislation will be promoted by one of two Presidents, neither looking at the farm problem through other than commercial eyes, I frankly confess that I can see but faint hope for anything in the nature of real farm relief. Everyone admits the unbalanced condition of agriculture. All thinking people know that the disparity existing between the profit earned by farm owners and the profit earned by those who are engaged in many other branches of industry is unfair under a form of Government founded upon the equality of its citizens.

More than 80 per cent of the wealth of the United States is located within less than one-fifth of geographical area, that one-fifth zone of great wealth being primarily an industrial area. The people within that zone do not work harder to produce their large profit than the people in agricultural sections work to secure their smaller profit. The difference is that the people in the so-called industrial zone have for long years enjoyed the benefit of special legislation which gave them an advantage over the people engaged in agricultural pursuits. The largest single legislative advantage has been the result of tariff legislation which has given them the advantage of increased and often fictitious prices. The one great problem of legislation in this hour should be to equalize the advantages conferred by our Federal Government, giving to all our people equal opportunity and the same legislative favor enjoyed now by a few favored people. This is the very heart of the farm problem.

Men are saying that the new Hoover administration will do more to give a square deal to agriculture than the Coolidge administration has done. Often I have stated my belief that President Coolidge is an honest man, honestly desiring to work for the welfare of the American people, and often I have similarly expressed myself as to our incoming President, Mr. Hoover. They talk about equality for the farming interests, but neither is willing to give to the American farm that justice which is its due, because if the American farm should be given full justice in the matter of tariff legislation—well, if that should be done, it would necessarily mean the withdrawal of many special privileges now enjoyed by the manufacturing industry under our present tariff policy. To that unfair tariff policy both President Coolidge and President Hoover are irrevocably committed.

What will be the character of any farm-relief legislation which may be enacted during the present session of the Congress, or at a later session to be called by President Hoover? I do not know. But I do know what it will not be. Of all the measures which have appeared in Congress in recent years for the relief of agriculture only two of them struck at the heart of the farm problem. Those two were the McNary-Haugen bill and the bill for an export premium or debenture plan. I think this debenture plan was promoted largely by Representative KETCHAM of Michigan, although I have regarded Representative MARVIN JONES of Texas as its primary advocate. The Coolidge administration would not let either plan become a law. Neither will the Hoover administration permit any such legislation to live. Still regarding both Coolidge and Hoover as honest men, one must not forget that their view of the farm problem is the view of big business. Big business is not willing to surrender the advantages it now enjoys under existing tariff law and tariff law interpretation. Naturally increased prices for farm products would mean increased prices for raw material which big business manufactures into its own articles of commerce. And so it is that the owners of American farms dare not look toward either Mr. Coolidge or Mr. Hoover for any legislation which shall not meet the favor of big business.

Mr. Hoover thinks in terms of commerce. He dreams of a vast commercial empire. He is almost obsessed by this dream. He thinks of agriculture only as an incident to the commercial fabric. His real mind was disclosed in a statement he made a year or more ago, long before he took the stump in the late campaign. In that statement he said that "the way to settle the farm problem is to balance agricultural production to the needs of the country." Now, let us carry that thought to its legitimate conclusion and see where we shall arrive. The fair conclusion is that such a policy would starve agriculture down to where it would merely supply the needs of the business interests, with never any surplus to send abroad, and in the end agriculture would become just what big business wants it to become—simply a feeder to the commerce of the country.

While I am always an optimist and never a pessimist, yet I can not feel justified in expressing to my Nebraska people any earnest hope for worth-while farm legislation during the coming year. From my touch with the leaders who are supposed to speak the views of President Coolidge and the incoming President I gather that such legislation as may be enacted will be nothing more nor less than a plan to loan more money to the farmers, the loaning program to be engineered by some sort of a farm board to be created in connection with the proposed new farm legislation. In my view such a plan could not carry any material relief to agriculture. However, in the absence of anything better, I shall support such a farm bill as may be offered by President Coolidge during the present session of the Congress, or any farm bill which may be offered by President Hoover at an extra session of the Congress. In taking this course I shall be supported by the belief that most anything in the nature of legislation to aid agriculture might improve the present unhappy condition of that great industry.

EDGAR HOWARD.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I will have to object to this. There is a day coming for that committee, but if preferred I will ask unanimous consent that it be passed over without prejudice.

DIVISION AND APPORTIONMENT OF THE WATERS OF THE NORTH PLATTE RIVER, ETC.

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 7026) granting the consent of Congress to compacts or agreements between the States of Colorado and Wyoming with respect to the division and apportionment of the waters of the North Platte River and other streams in which such States are jointly interested.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. Speaker, this is a bill in which the gentleman from Colorado, Mr. TAYLOR, is interested, and I ask that it and the following bill, Calendar No. 896, H. R. 7027, be passed over without prejudice.

Mr. LEATHERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, in view of the investigations going that might affect the States involved, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Utah?

Mr. CRAMTON. Is it the idea of the gentleman from Utah that he will be able to act on this at an early date?

Mr. LEATHERWOOD. There are other bills that have been passed over without prejudice, involving the same questions.

Mr. CRAMTON. And the gentleman is not disposed longer to press his objection against this bill?

Mr. LEATHERWOOD. I am only asking that this be passed over without prejudice by reason of some investigations made by some gentlemen personally. It does not affect my State at all, and I have satisfied myself that as a matter of law we do not have to come in advance to Congress to get permission to make the compacts.

Mr. CRAMTON. The gentleman was asking that this bill be put in different form from the others. Does the gentleman withdraw that request, and is he willing to have this put in the same form as the others?

Mr. LEATHERWOOD. I do not think I would object for the reason that the bill and any amendments that may be made to it will bind the State of Utah.

MARION BRANCH, NATIONAL SOLDIERS' HOME

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 14153) to authorize an additional appropriation of $150,000 for the construction of a hospital annex at Marion Branch.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. JAMES] stated the last time this matter was before the House that he would look into the figure named here and ascertain if he could give the House any reasonable assurance that the amount here authorized would be sufficient to complete the work.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Speaker, I would be glad to have the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HALL] answer the gentleman as to that. I understand he has been in touch with the Supervising Architect of the Treasury on this subject.

Mr. HALL of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I have just been in touch with the Supervising Architect this morning, and I learn that the plans for the entire structure have been completed, and he informs me that this $150,000 will be sufficient to do the work required.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Then, the gentleman can give the House reasonable assurance that this amount will complete the construction?

Mr. HALL of Indiana. I am satisfied that it will.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, being concerned about another aspect, to wit, as to whether the work can be done for less money, I have in mind to offer an amendment to this bill—and also to No. 1004 and No. 1006 on the Consent Calendar—which will insert the words "not more than," with the expectation that when the appropriation comes before the Appropriations Committee they will go into the situation to see if there is actually a need for so much as is here authorized.

Mr. HALL of Indiana. I will be glad to accept such an amendment.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Will the gentleman from Michigan yield?

Mr. CRAMTON. Yes.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. I just take this opportunity to make an inquiry, because the gentleman has offered several amendments of that kind, and it seems to me they are without purpose. If I understand the duties of the Appropriations Committee, they have that authority anyway. If Congress, for example, authorizes $250,000 for this particular project and the Committee on Appropriations decides that only $200,000 is needed, I know of no reason which would compel the Committee on Appropriations to bring in an appropriation of $250,000.

Mr. CRAMTON. I will say to the gentleman from Texas that personally I agree with him, but the House has not seemed to agree with him, and so that we might minimize the criticism of the Appropriations Committee I offer this amendment for the purpose of making it clear that at the time the bill passes it is intended that the committee shall make that examination. On one or two occasions when the Appropriations Committee have on examination—having before them information that the House did not have at the time it acted—refused an appropriation they have not only been criticized but rather roughly treated here in the House, it being argued that if the House passes a bill for the appropriation of a certain amount of money it is the duty of the Appropriations Committee to accept that mandate. I do not entirely agree with that, but certainly, if we put in the words "not more than," then there is a mandate given the committee with respect to the actual expenditure to be made.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Will he gentleman yield further?

Mr. CRAMTON. Yes.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. For this particular project $100,000 was originally authorized to construct an addition of 50 beds. It is now desired to add $150,000 to that amount, which would make a total appropriation of $250,000, or $5,000 a bed. I would like to inquire as to how that compares with the general cost of Government hospitals. It occurs to me it is a rather high amount. The Appropriations Committee should make careful inquiry.

Mr. CRAMTON. It certainly is enough. I think whatever error my friend from Indiana [Mr. HALL] has made heretofore, he is not erring in the same direction again, and my thought in these amendments is to make it clear that the House intends the Appropriations Committee to study that phase of the question and not recommend as large an appropriation unless it is really necessary.

Mr. BARBOUR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAMTON. Yes.

Mr. BARBOUR. I will say to the gentleman from Texas that where the amount is fixed in the authorization bill, that is often thereafter taken by the departments, the Budget, and everybody else as the amount which Congress expects will be spent, and they make their plans and specifications accordingly.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Mr. Speaker, still further reserving the right to object, does the gentleman from California think there is any virtue in adding the language "not more than"?

Mr. BARBOUR. Well, it might have some moral effect.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. I am unable to see the point. However, I imagine it will do no harm.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to address a question to the gentleman from Michigan. Does he not entertain any apprehension that unless these words are put in every appropriation bill improper inferences may be drawn? In other words, if two measures were compared, one saying "not more than" and the other omitting those words, would there not be the right to infer that this was done purposely?

Before the gentleman answers, I may point out that certain bills come in here under suspension of the rules, where amendment is impossible. The gentleman on unanimous-consent day has an opportunity to carry out his purpose, but there will inevitably be measures, such as one in which I am particularly interested, the hospital construction bill, where through inadvertence or through ignorance of the gentleman's position, these words may be omitted.

Now, agreeing as I do, thoroughly, with the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK] and the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON] that it is the duty of the Committee on Appropriations to spend less money if possible, and feeling that there may be danger in deviating from what has been the established policy of the House, I rather think it is unwise to insert these words. Why, that is what the Committee on Appropriations is for. It exists for that purpose, and if we once gave any weight to the contention that it must appropriate all that it is authorized to appropriate, then the function of the committee would disappear.

Mr. CRAMTON. I will say to the gentleman from Massachusetts that I agree with him as to the duty of the Appropriations Committee, whichever form is used, to only recommend as much as their study convinces them is required, but, in the first place, as the gentleman from California [Mr. BARBOUR] states, when the words "not more than" are omitted and a specific amount is carried in the bill, that is taken by the department and the Budget, without further study, as being the amount that Congress wants.

Furthermore, the thing that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE] fears may come to pass has already come to pass. The House membership generally have not concurred in the theory that the Appropriations Committee ought to make this study in any event. I recall a bill passed the Congress authorizing the payment of a certain Indian judgment with interest, entirely out of line with the general policy, but it got through with a limited amount of attention, and then when the Committee on Appropriations made a study of it and developed facts that the House had not been aware of at the time, we refused to recommend the appropriation. Then on the floor of the House the item was offered as an amendment and our committee was severely castigated by Members for having disobeyed the mandate, as they called it, of the House; and, as a matter of fact, we were voted down on the proposition.

I think, notwithstanding that, the committee ought to make a study and to avoid any question of criticism because none of us wants any more criticism than is necessary; when these words are inserted, then certainly it is the duty of the committee to make the study and no one can criticize the committee for making it.

Mr. LUCE. But the gentleman does not meet my suggestion that there will be diversity between bills coming to the Appropriations Committee.

Mr. CRAMTON. There already is a diversity, and there already is the claim made that when a definite amount is recommended it is the duty of the committee to recommend that amount.

Mr. LUCE. When bills come to him, as I have suggested, under suspension of the rules and the words will be lacking, how will the gentleman meet that situation?

Mr. CRAMTON. My own judgment is that the duty is with the committee in any event, and as one member of the committee I am prepared to meet that duty, but in as many cases as it is feasible to do it, I think it best to have this sort of language, and, as I understand, the ranking member on the Military Affairs Committee said the other day that hereafter it would be the policy of that committee to use such words so as to remove this question.

Mr. BARBOUR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAMTON. Yes.

Mr. BARBOUR. Would not that whole situation be obviated if the Appropriations Committee was left, in the first place, to determine the amount of money that should be expended? In other words, let the bill from the legislative committee authorize the construction of a certain building or whatever it may be, and stop there. Then let the Committee on Appropriations go into the matter and determine what the proper cost should be.

Mr. LUCE. That might be wise, but, with all due deference to the most admirable and efficacious Committee on Appropriations, other gentlemen of the House might think that their judgment was worth while and desirable in these matters. For example, the committee of which I have the honor to be a member, the Committee on World War Veterans' Legislation, is probably better equipped by experience and by having at its command the services of experts, to determine that matter than would be a Committee on Appropriations which does not specialize in that particular thing.

Mr. BARBOUR. I think the gentleman is right about that, but at the same time, if I understand the gentleman from Massachusetts correctly, he expects the Committee on Appropriations to scrutinize the recommendations of his own committee and pass on them later.

Mr. LUCE. The whole purpose of having a Committee on Appropriations, I take it, is to secure a double check.

Mr. BURTNESS. Will the gentleman from California yield?

Mr. BARBOUR. I have not the floor.

Mr. BURTNESS. I think the suggestion made by the gentleman from California is very pat. I have often wondered why a legislative committee in reporting legislation to authorize a building, for instance, to be used as a hospital, is concerned with more than the authorization of the building. If the legislation authorizes the building, then it is up to the Appropriations Committee in all cases to determine what the cost will be, which would be much the simpler way and would reduce the work of the House considerably, because you would not have to correct the old legislation from time to time.

Mr. LEAVITT. Where would the Budget come in if that kind of bill were sent out from the committee authorizing expenditures—if they were all made in blank and the Budget was completely left out?

Mr. BURTNESS. I do not think that would be a material question.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby authorized to be appropriated out of money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated $150,000, in addition to the $100,000 authorized to be appropriated by section 3 of the act approved March 4, 1927 (Public, No. 798, 69th Cong.), for the construction of a fire-proof hospital annex at the Marion Branch of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CRAMTON: In line 4, after the word "appropriated" insert the words "not more than."

The amendment was agreed to, and the bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

SIGNAL DEPOT WAREHOUSE, PHILIPPINE DEPARTMENT

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 14155) to authorize the appropriations for construction at military posts, and for other purposes.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I think the last clause in the bill is objectionable. We have had trouble with that sort of provision in a bill before, where you throw the doors open and say—with such utilities and appurtenances thereto as in the judgment of the Secretary of War may be necessary.

I think we should strike that language out of the bill.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Speaker, I have no objection to that.

Mr. CRAMTON. I think it would be better to leave in the words "as may be necessary" and to strike out the words "in the judgment of the Secretary of War."

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I think that is a good suggestion, and I shall accept it.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby authorized to be appropriated $49,000 for the construction and installation in the Philippine Department of a signal-depot warehouse, with such utilities and appurtenances thereto as in the judgment of the Secretary of War may be necessary.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LAGUARDIA: Line 6, after the word "as," strike out "in the judgment of the Secretary of War."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. LAGUARDIA: In line 3, after the word "appropriated," insert the words "not more than."

The amendment was agreed to; and the bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

POWDER-BLENDING UNIT AT PICATINNY ARSENAL

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 14156) to authorize an appropriation for the construction of a cannon powder-blending unit at Picatinny Arsenal, Dover, N. J.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ACKERMAN], who represents that district, is absent on account of sickness. I ask unanimous consent that the bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

CONSTRUCTION OF MESS HALL, ETC., UNITED STATES MILITARY ACADEMY

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 14813) to authorize an appropriation for completing the new cadet mess hall, United States Military Academy.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Reserving the right to object, I call the attention of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. JAMES] to the fact that I have received a great many complaints as to the rate of wages paid to skilled and unskilled laborers employed in the construction of these new buildings at West Point. I had a long conference last night with the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MORIN], and he tells me that they are operating under a law which was passed last year providing the rate of wages. I believe he told me that the rate of wages for unskilled labor was $4 a day. I want to say to the gentleman from Michigan and to the House that a laborer in the State of New York in that vicinity can not live and support his family on $4 a day. That is $24 a week, assuming the weather is good, and rain does not prevent him from working. This work is being carried on efficiently, I will admit, by the quartermaster officer, but there is no reason why the prevailing rate of wages should not be paid. I suggest as an amendment a proviso to the effect that the prevailing rate of wages paid for similar work in the vicinity of West Point shall be paid to all skilled and unskilled workers employed for the purpose authorized.

Mr. JAMES. Has the gentleman from New York talked with the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MORIN]?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes. He says that they are paying the unskilled laborers $4 a day and the skilled laborers $8 a day. That is below the prevailing rate of wages. Am I not right about that?

Mr. BARBOUR. I do not know as to that, but it has been reported to the subcommittee on War Department appropriations that one of the reasons for this is because of the increased wages they have had to pay.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The original estimates were made on going out and bargaining with the workers to work below the prevailing rates, and I believe a bill was passed at the last session that has something to do with it. I did not have time to investigate that this morning, but the Chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs told me that they fixed the rate of wages at $4 a day. That is below the prevailing rate. I do not believe we want to economize by bargaining with unskilled laborers.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. No bill was passed requiring the War Department to employ labor at any certain rate. There is no law of that kind. There is nothing to hinder them from paying the prevailing rate of wages.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I did not believe there was.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. And there should not be any amendment such as the gentleman suggests here. It would be unusual. I dare say that the War Department will pay the prevailing rate of wages with this increased appropriation. There ought not to be any mandatory direction of that kind.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. They are not paying the prevailing rate of wages.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Perhaps the appropriation is not sufficient, but this additional appropriation will provide additional funds.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I shall press my amendment.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. The gentleman can press his amendment, but I do not want the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. JAMES] to agree to it, because it ought not to prevail.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. That puts the gentleman from Michigan in an embarrassing situation, if the gentleman from New York threatens him one way and the gentleman from Texas another.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. I certainly would object to an amendment of that kind, because it would be unusual and, I think, unnecessary.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I will do this. I will not make it a condition, but I shall submit my amendment and let it come to a vote. I think that is fair.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. The gentleman has a right to submit his amendment, of course.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $297,540 for completing the construction of the new cadet mess hall, cadet store, dormitories, and drawing academy at the United States Military Academy.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I have an amendment which I desire to offer.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 7, strike out the period, insert a semicolon, and add the following proviso: "Provided, That the prevailing rate of wages paid for similar work in the vicinity of West Point shall be paid to all skilled and unskilled workers employed for the purpose herein authorized."

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order against the amendment that it is not germane to the bill. The bill in question authorizes an increase in appropriation for certain West Point buildings amounting to $297,540. It does not deal at all with the question of wages to be paid to labor, and therefore I make the point of order that the amendment is not germane to the bill.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. This is a legislative bill. It provides and authorizes an appropriation for the construction of buildings and surely we can provide as to the method of employment, and it is entirely germane and within the meaning of the rule.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks this bill merely authorizes an appropriation to complete a building already in course of construction. There is no question arising on the face of the bill with reference to labor, wages, or anything of the sort. The Chair thinks it is not germane and sustains the point of order.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a preferential motion. I move to strike out the enacting clause, and on that I desire to be heard.

Mr. Speaker, I sought by proper parliamentary tactics to correct a condition which I believe no Member of this House will approve. We have over a million dollars' worth of work going on at West Point Military Academy. That work is under the direction of a quartermaster officer. He employs workers, skilled and unskilled, and labor conditions up there have been nothing short of a scandal. Bargains have been driven and workers have been employed under stress of unemployment and the necessities there below the prevailing rate of wages. Now, I think it is a crying shame for Congress to sanction a continuation of such a condition. I am reliably informed we are paying laborers there $4 a day. That is $24 a week, and I assure you gentlemen that a man can not support his family decently in the vicinity of West Point on $24 a week. I submit to the ruling of the Chair. The gentleman from Texas is entirely within his rights if he desires to take advantage of his parliamentary rights and defeat something that seems to be very necessary. On the other hand, I do not believe that we should sanction this appropriation without full knowledge that in doing so the United States Government is running a "scab" shop at West Point and employing men on starvation wages. I would rather defeat the entire bill than permit such conditions to prevail with the sanction of Congress. If my motion prevails, it is certain that the committee will bring in a bill protecting the rights of labor and paying them a decent, living wage. I would rather not have these buildings constructed if we can not pay labor the proper scale of wages.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. If the gentleman's amendment is adopted, the Secretary of War will have no money with which to pay these increases in labor cost that he speaks about.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Then let us not do the work.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Certainly.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. There is another phase in the matter. It is evident in my community with respect to public work. An outside contractor who does not pay his employees the rate of wages prevailing in the vicinity of the place where the work is going on has a distinct advantage over other contractors in that vicinity.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes. Let me tell the gentleman that in Government work a contractor is expected to pay the rate of wages prevailing in the vicinity.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. The bill introduced by the gentleman from New York [Mr. BACON] provides for that, but we have not been able to get a vote on it.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The bill of the gentleman from New York provides that they must pay the wages of the locality where the work is going on.

Mr. DOWELL. But the Government is not now paying the prevailing rate of wages in the communities where the work is going on, and that amendment should be adopted in every one of these bills.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] to strike out the enacting clause.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. WOOD. A division, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. A division is demanded.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 30, noes 70.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on account of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and fifty-five Members are present, not a quorum. The Clerk will call the roll. As many as favor the motion of the gentleman from New York to strike out the enacting clause will, when their names are called, answer "yea"; those opposed will answer "nay."

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 54, nays 272, not voting 101, as follows:

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CRAMTON: Page 1, line 5, before the figures "$297,540," insert the words "not more than."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

COLLECTION AND EDITING OF OFFICIAL PAPERS OF THE TERRITORIES OF THE UNITED STATES

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (S. 1168), to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the collection and editing of official papers of the Territories of the United States now in the national archives," approved March 3, 1925.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object for the purpose of calling the attention of the Committee on the Revision of Laws to the fact that this is one law that is not indexed in the Code of Laws. I do this so that the reviser of the index may be advised.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I am quite dubious about the value of this bill, particularly since out of nearly 2,000 copies of the works that are to be published only 50 will go to the Department of State. Personally I do not know what I or any other Member will do with two copies. However, I am not disposed to make an objection, but I do suggest that section 4 ought to be amended by striking out all after the words "Department of State," in line 5 on page 3. As it reads, the Department of State will be enabled, through some mathematics of their own, to add to a certain one of their appropriations. I do not think that is desirable. I think the regular staff can do this work, and there is no necessity for enlarging that particular appropriation to that extent.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. If the gentleman will permit, I intend to ask that this bill go over without prejudice.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

RELIEF OF INDIANS

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 7031) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to arrange with States for the education, medical attention, and relief of distress of Indians, and for other purposes.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, and I expect to do so, this bill, in my mind, is quite undesirable. I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks with reference to it and in doing so to insert a portion of a letter expressing the views of the Indian welfare committee of the General Federation of Women's Clubs.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CRAMTON. The bill is unnecessary and undesirable. In so far as it can serve any good purpose, the authority now exists. It is, however, so broad in its terms as to make possible, indeed to invite, the States to spend the money of the Federal Government. Having difficulty at times in supervising and controlling the acts of our own officials, we are asked to turn our problems over to officials whom we do not select, whom we can not remove, whom we can not control. Our officials and employees are under civil service. State officials and employees are customarily under the political patronage system. Our officials and employees have back of them the national sentiment for generous treatment of the Indian and the national confidence in his possibilities. The State officials and employees are too often subject to a local sentiment that seeks to exploit the Indian, too often share in a local lack of confidence in his possibilities. We are building up an organization of specialists and any improvement in our policies acts directly on the whole field. The States would have varying policies, varying standards, and, once a contract was made, changes and improvements in policies could affect the field slowly if at all.

The far-reaching character of the bill is in this language:

> That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized, in his discretion, to enter into a contract or contracts with any State having legal authority so to do for the education, medical attention, and relief of distress of Indians in such State, and to expend under such contract or contracts moneys appropriated by Congress for such purpose.
> SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Interior in making any contract herein authorized with any State may permit such State to utilize, for the purposes of this act, existing school buildings, hospitals, and all equipment therein or appertaining thereto, including livestock and other personal property owned by the Government, under such terms and conditions as may be agreed upon for their use and maintenance.

That is broad enough to transfer to the several States, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior, all our expenditures for education, health, and relief of distress, while retaining all our full organization for handling of the business and industrial affairs of the Indians. The State and Federal supervision would, under any general application of this plan, become inextricably mixed, with duplication of effort, controversy of purpose, and passing the buck galore. General exercise of the authority to contract with the States here proposed would be disaster. And the politicians and Indian exploiters of every Indian State would be alert and swarm on the Secretary of the Interior for such contracts. And the Secretary of the Interior would have a right to assume that passage of this act was intended by Congress as approval of such a general policy.

It may be urged that no such general policy is intended. The bill does not so indicate, and it would be construed as I have indicated. And if no general policy is so purposed, if it is not intended by this act to express the desire of Congress for general handling of these Federal funds by State authorities, why have the bill at all?

Close cooperation between State and Federal authorities in matters pertaining to the education, health, and relief of the Indian, as well as to his industrial development and general advancement, is greatly to be desired. It is being secured in a constantly increasing degree. Just as the Federal policies are being improved and expanded, so is the best thought of the various Indian States coming more and more to appreciate the importance of the Indian and his welfare, and they are working more and more in harmony with us for his advancement. And there is ample law now for such cooperation. We place Indian children in local white schools and pay their tuition there now. We place them in State institutions for deaf or dumb or blind or backward children and pay for their care there now under contract. We have just accepted very wise and generous cooperation by the State of North Dakota by which, without payment of tuition, Indian boys from the United States Indian boarding school at Wahpeton can go across the road and receive instruction at the State science school, an industrial school. In Wisconsin State public health nurses are doing good work on our Indian reservations. In many States very helpful cooperation in matters of health and education now exists, and I do not know of any feasible cooperation now proposed that is hindered by lack of law.

The proposed law is an invitation to trouble, which, if accepted, would lead to disaster.

A close student of Indian affairs and a generous champion of his interests is Mrs. Joseph Lindon Smith, chairman of the Indian welfare committee of the General Federation of Women's Clubs. She has written me as follows, expressing her protest against the proposed legislation:

GENERAL FEDERATION OF WOMEN'S CLUBS,
Washington, D. C., January 3, 1929.

Hon. LOUIS C. CRAMTON,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. CRAMTON: As chairman of the division of Indian welfare of the General Federation of Women's Clubs I wish to enter protest against the passage at this time of House bill 7031, a bill authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to arrange with States for the education, medical attention, and relief of distress of Indians, and for other purposes.

I consider that it has been the uniform experience in the history of Indian administration that when Indians have been released from Federal jurisdiction 90 per cent of them have lost their property and a large number of them have become landless and homeless. When Congress in 1906 removed the restrictions on the lands of the mixed-blood Indians of the White Earth Reservation there followed a period of fraud, corruption, and debauchery of these helpless Indians. The removal of the restrictions by Congress on the lands of the Indians of the Five Civilized Tribes has resulted in decreasing the land estate of these Indians from 19,000,000 acres to approximately 3,000,000 acres in a period of less than 25 years, and the Indian Bureau was powerless to protect these Indians.

Cooperation between the Indian Bureau officials, State bureaus of public health, the Extension Service of the Department of Agriculture, and other public and private agencies is of vital importance to the welfare of the Indians and is an avowed policy of the Indian Service officials increasingly in effect.

In Wisconsin and Minnesota the General Federation of Women's Clubs have assisted materially in welfare work for the Indians, done in cooperation with the Indian Bureau and State officials. We issued a bulletin (October, 1928) on the Meriam report, and in it we indorsed the policy of the retention by the Federal Government of the control and supervision of the Indians as long as practicable.

It seems to us that the editorial from the Santa Fe New Mexican of December 20, attached, gives an accurate picture of the situation, and I trust that House bill 7031 will be recalled from the calendar and returned to the committee without further action by Congress.

Sincerely yours,

CORINNA LINDON SMITH,
Chairman Division of Indian Welfare,
General Federation of Women's Clubs.

[Editorial from the Santa Fe New Mexican, December 20, 1928]

THE INDIANS AND THE STATES

The Leavitt bill now before Congress provides that the care, responsibility, and future of the American Indian tribes may be farmed out to the various States, with grants of present national funds to pay the freight.

The average person does not know what an important measure it is and that the well-being and happiness of several hundred thousand people are involved. Neither do they realize that if the measure should become a law there would immediately start a campaign of spoliation such as this Nation never saw before. Imagine the ravage that New Mexico politicians would indulge in were such an opportunity afforded them!

The National Government from the beginning has had charge of this work. There have been abuses at times. Crooks get into the Indian Service as every other branch of governmental activity. Less often there are Indian leaders who are rascals. They are the exceptions that prove the rule.

The Indian Service has evolved into a most efficient system, worthy of a Government of this size. If each State were to take it up, they would not have the experience of a hundred years back of them. Few of them would have learned anything from history. The result would be a crushing blow to the present wards of the Government.

There is nothing the matter with the Indian Service, except that it should be given more money and encouraged to modernize its ways in a few particulars.

When it comes to State Indian service, may the good Lord preserve us, and the Indians!

The bill is of such far-reaching importance that I believe the Committee on Indian Affairs might well give it further consideration in committee before asking the House to consider it.

Mr. LEAVITT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting the bill itself and the report of the committee, since there has been so much misunderstanding with regard to its purpose and its effect.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Montana asks unanimous consent to print the bill itself in the RECORD as well as the report of the committee. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The bill and report follow:

[H. R. 7031, 70th Cong., 2d sess.]

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

December 12, 1927.

Mr. LEAVITT introduced the following bill; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs and ordered to be printed. December 14, 1928, reported with an amendment, committed to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

A bill (H. R. 7031) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to arrange with States for the education, medical attention, and relief of distress of Indians, and for other purposes

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized, in his discretion, to enter into a contract or contracts with any State having legal authority so to do for the education, medical attention, and relief of distress of and promotion of agriculture among the Indians in such State, and to expend under such contract or contracts moneys appropriated by Congress for such purpose.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Interior in making any contract herein authorized with any State may permit such State to utilize, for the purposes of this act, existing school buildings, hospitals, and all equipment therein or appertaining thereto, including livestock and other personal property owned by the Government, under such terms and conditions as may be agreed upon for their use and maintenance.

SEC. 3. That the Secretary of the Interior, after entering into any contract or contracts as herein authorized with any State, may permit the agents and employees of such State to enter upon Indian tribal lands, reservations, or allotments for the purpose of making inspection of health and educational conditions and enforcing sanitation and quarantine regulations or to enforce compulsory school attendance of Indian pupils, as provided by the law of the State.

SEC. 4. That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to perform any and all acts and to make such rules and regulations as may be necessary and proper for the purpose of carrying the provisions of this act into effect.

SEC. 5. That the Secretary of the Interior shall report to Congress on or before the first Monday in December of each year any contract or contracts made under the provisions of this act and the moneys expended thereunder.

[H. Rept. No. 1955, 70th Cong., 2d sess.]

RELIEF OF DISTRESS OF INDIANS

Mr. LEAVITT, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, submitted the following report, to accompany H. R. 7031.

The Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 7031) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to arrange with States for the education, medical attention, and relief of distress of Indians, and for other purposes, having considered the same, report thereon with a recommendation that it do pass with the following amendment:

Page 1, line 6, after the words "distress of" add "and promotion of agriculture among the."

For a number of years those constructively interested in the welfare of the Indians have been growing in the belief that it should be made possible for such States having considerable Indian population as have developed efficient agencies to deal with health and educational problems and to relieve distress among the indigent to give the benefit of such agencies to their Indian population as well as to the white.

Already some States, notably Minnesota, are giving attention to the health of the Indians, not only for the sake of the Indians, but for the protection of the people generally. Doctor Guthrie, the head of the Indian health work and a trained officer of the Bureau of Public Health, has testified to the great value of such cooperation. In many of the States the Federal Government has been paying tuition for the education of Indian children in the public schools, this over a sufficient period of years to demonstrate its unquestioned value.

At its last session the Legislature of Wisconsin enacted a law authorizing the government to enter into contracts with the Federal Government for the education, health, relief of indigency, and promotion of agriculture among Wisconsin Indians, thus leading the way for legislative enactments by such States as so desire to enable them to cooperate in like manner.

The Institute for Government Research, in its report entitled "The Problem of Indian Administration," submitted February 21, 1928, discusses this problem, beginning on page 98, as follows:

"With respect to the division of authority and responsibility between the National and the State and local Governments, the survey has proceeded upon these principles:

"1. That under the Constitution of the United States and in accordance with the historical development of the country, the function of providing for the Indians is the responsibility of the National Government.

"2. That the National Government should not transfer activities incident to this function to individual States unless and until a particular State is prepared to conduct the activity in accordance with standards at least as high as those adopted by the National Government.

"3. That the transfer of activities from the National Government to the State governments should not be made wholesale, but one activity at a time, as the willingness and ability of the State justify.

"4. That no great effort should be made toward uniformity in the treatment of all the States, as the question of the willingness and ability of the States is an individual one, with very different answers for different States.

"5. That when a State assumes responsibility for a particular activity, as in the case of admitting the children of nontaxed Indians to public schools or providing for nontaxed Indians in hospitals, it is eminently proper that the National Government should make contributions to the cost in the form of payments for tuition or hospital fees, and that so long as national funds are thus used the National Government is under obligation to maintain officials such as the day-school inspectors, to cooperate in the work done by the States to see that it is up to the required standard and that the Indians for whom the National Government is primarily responsible are receiving the agreed service.

"6. That the National Government is under no legal or moral obligation to make the real property of the Indians subject to the regular State and county taxes until such time as the Indians are prepared to maintain themselves in the presence of white civilization and the States are prepared to render full governmental service to the Indians according to standards which will protect them from neglect and retrogression.

"7. That it is in general highly desirable that the States should as rapidly as possible assume responsibility for the administration of activities which they can effectively perform alike for whites and for the Indians with a single organization, with the exception of activities that are directly concerned with Indian property. Experience tends to demonstrate that national control and supervision of property must be about the last of the activities transferred to the States."

Its great importance is further emphasized by President Coolidge in his annual message to the Congress on the 4th of this month, when he said:

"The movement in Congress and in some of the State legislatures for extending responsibility in Indian affairs to States should be encouraged."

This measure does not remove any of the protection of the Federal Government from the Indians. It does not apply to their property. It does allow the Federal Government to work cooperatively through State agencies for the betterment of the health of the Indians, for their education, for the relief of their distress, and for their agricultural advancement wherever the interests of the Indians will be advanced thereby, but it forces no such activities on any State. It authorizes cooperative contracts between the Federal Government and the States within carefully restricted fields of service in cases where the Indians will be benefited.

H. R. 6075, which is practically identical with this bill, was introduced by Representative Kelly, of Pennsylvania.

The favorable report of the Secretary of the Interior, with approval of the Bureau of the Budget, follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,

Washington, January 13, 1928.

Hon. SCOTT LEAVITT,

Chairman Committee on Indian Affairs,

House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. LEAVITT: I have the honor to reply to your request of December 14 for reports on H. R. 7031 and H. R. 6075, both of which cover proposed arrangements for the transfer to States of activities of the Indian Bureau dealing with education, medical attention, and relief of Indians. Inasmuch as the bills are identical in purpose and substantially identical in language, it is felt that both may be covered in a single report.

The principle underlying the proposed legislation is in agreement with my belief that the time has arrived when States directly interested in the civilization and advancement of Indians should begin to assume a greater degree of responsibility for Indian affairs, especially in the matter of directing the activities specifically mentioned in the bills under consideration. In several specific statements, including reports on legislation having the same general objective, introduced during sessions of the Sixty-ninth Congress, and in recent annual reports to the President, I have expressed this view.

A number of States directly concerned have given indications of a disposition favorable to the proposal and there appears to be little reason to doubt that their attitude in the matter may be regarded as indicative of a general willingness on the part of State authorities to assume further responsibility in the administration of Indian affairs.

The proposed legislation has my approval and I recommend that it be enacted into law.

Under date of January 4, 1928, the Bureau of the Budget advised that this report is not in conflict with the financial program of the President.

Very truly yours,

HUBERT WORK.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I object.

TELEPHONE LINE FROM FLAGSTAFF TO KAYENTA

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (S. 3779) to authorize the construction of a telephone line from Flagstaff to Kayenta on the Western Navajo Indian Reservation, Ariz.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, may I inquire of the author of the bill why it is not possible to have the Signal Corps build this line. They have the men and they have the material, so that surely they could build this line without any difficulty at all. They are building lines and taking them down for practice, so there is no reason why they could not build a permanent line. I think they have sufficient material and appropriations to do so.

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. I can not answer that question from my own knowledge. The only information I have on the subject is that the Secretary of the Interior has recommended this bill. I did not know that the Signal Corps constructed lines to Indian reservations.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. They are putting them up and taking them down for practice so I think they could build a permanent line. I intend to ask that this bill go over without prejudice.

Mr. CRAMTON. I will say to the gentleman that what he is suggesting is something new to me. I am satisfied this telephone line is required and I am going to offer my usual amendment that "not more than" $35,000 is authorized. I will also say that if this bill becomes a law that before the appropriation is made we will make a careful check to see if it is possible to do what the gentleman from New York suggests, and if it is possible, of course, we prefer to do it.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. It would come before the gentleman's subcommittee.

Mr. CRAMTON. Either that or the deficiency subcommittee, and I will promise to give it my attention.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. That is satisfactory, and in the meantime I will take the matter up with the Chief of the Signal Corps.

Mr. CRAMTON. I will at the proper time offer an amendment to perfect the paragraph as to the name of the institution.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to make an inquiry of the gentleman from Montana [Mr. LEAVITT]. I notice this bill is to construct a telephone line to an Indian reservation and is not made reimbursable. Are there any funds to the credit of these Indians by which it could be made reimbursable?

Mr. LEAVITT. It could be made reimbursable so far as the item is concerned, but that would mean nothing in the final result. It is a telephone line that is necessary for the health and the welfare of the Indians and should be built according to the terms of the bill.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. It is the custom of Congress, as I understand it, wherever Indians have trust funds to their credit and work of this kind is done to make it reimbursable out of their funds.

Mr. LEAVITT. My information is that they do not have the funds to pay it.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. That is the inquiry I wanted to make; of course, if they have not it would not come within that classification. There would be no value in making the item reimbursable.

Mr. LEAVITT. The amendment of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON] is entirely acceptable to the committee.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That $35,000 is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the reconstruction of the telephone line from Flagstaff to the Western Navajo Indian Agency at Tuba City, and for the construction of a continuation of said telephone line from Tuba City to the Marsh Pass Indian Boarding School at Kayenta, Ariz.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. CRAMTON: Page 1, line 3, after the word "that," insert the words "not more than."

Page 2, line 1, strike out the words "Marsh Pass Indian Boarding School" and insert in lieu thereof "Tuberculosis Sanatorium."

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

INTERSTATE COMMERCE IN COTTON

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 13646) for the prevention and removal of obstructions and burdens upon interstate commerce in cotton by regulating transactions on cotton-futures exchanges, and for other purposes.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. CLARKE. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be passed over without prejudice.

Mr. CAREW. Mr. Speaker, how many objections are required?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. This bill requires three objections, but the gentleman from Georgia has asked unanimous consent to have it passed over without prejudice, and without objection it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

NATIONAL HOME FOR DISABLED VOLUNTEER SOLDIERS

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 15013) to amend the act entitled "An act to authorize the Board of Managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers to accept title to the State camp for veterans at Bath, N. Y.," approved May 26, 1928.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would call the attention of the committee to one or two phases of this bill and make one or two inquiries. I am in complete sympathy with the purpose to be accomplished. The method strikes me as open to serious query. The report accompanying the bill——

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, under the rules three objections are required; and the gentleman has no right of reservation unless he can get two more to join him.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has the right to make the reservation. If some one demands the regular order——

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I demand the regular order, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 1 of the act entitled "An act to authorize the Board of Managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers to accept title to the State camp for veterans at Bath, N. Y.," approved May 26, 1928, is amended to read as follows:

"That the Board of Managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, when directed by the President, is authorized to accept on behalf of the United States, free from all encumbrances and without cost to the United States, title in fee simple to the land, including buildings, structures, and cemetery, constituting the camp for veterans at Bath, N. Y. Such camp shall be perpetually maintained and used as a camp or home for veterans of the wars of the United States, and the veterans of the Civil War and the veterans of the Spanish-American War who are inmates of such camp at the time of such transfer shall be maintained therein during their lives. Upon acceptance of said camp by the Board of Managers such land, buildings, structures, and cemetery shall become the Bath branch of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers."

SEC. 2. Section 2 of such act, approved May 22, 1928, is hereby repealed.

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out, beginning on line 5 of page 2, the sentence:

Such camp shall be perpetually maintained and used as a camp or home for veterans of the wars of the United States, and the veterans of the Civil War and the veterans of the Spanish-American War who are inmates of such camp at the time of such transfer shall be maintained therein during their lives.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Massachusetts offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. LUCE offers the following amendment: Page 2, line 5, beginning with the words "such camp," strike out all down to and including the word "lives" in line 10.

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Speaker, I offer this amendment primarily to let the House know what it is doing in the way of instituting a precedent that will have a grave effect upon the future relations between the Government and those who desire to give to it facilities for the care of veterans. In the first place, I point out that the committee making the report in this matter contents itself by informing the House that the purpose of the bill is to eliminate technicalities between the act passed by the State of New York and the act of Congress. It does not explain what those technicalities are. With all deference and good nature, I suggest the propriety of informing the House in reports of committees what changes are contemplated by bills that are reported. The bill itself shows neither by the use of italics nor by the repetition of the bill that has been amended what change has been made.

Mr. STALKER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUCE. Yes.

Mr. STALKER. The other bill was enacted into law. This is a new bill. It is not an amendment.

Mr. LUCE. It is an amendment to existing law, and there should be brought into this House no amendment to existing law that does not enable Members readily and quickly to know what the existing law is and what change is proposed. That is a matter of technical draftsmanship which has been receiving the consideration of certain thoughtful Members of the House, and it is hoped that by rule or precedent we may presently be able to be informed when a change is made, what it is.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. There is a rule now pending to that effect upon the Speaker's desk.

Mr. LUCE. I certainly hope that the rule will prevail, and, anticipating the purpose of the rule. I am exercising the privilege of a Member in trying to find out just what changes are contemplated.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUCE. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I think there should be such a rule adopted by the House. I did not know that such a proposed new rule had been introduced last May by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. RAMSEYER]. I introduced last month a bill to require the printing of bills so that the portions of existing law to be stricken out should be printed with a line drawn through them, and the proposed new law should be printed in italics. This is the law in Wisconsin and in many other States and ought to be the law here. To-day either House of Congress can pass and sometimes does pass bills of which not three Members on the floor really know the meaning.

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Speaker, I chanced to address myself to this subject, however, because I am concerned, deeply concerned, with the main proposition as a member of the Committee on World War Veterans' Legislation, whose duty in part it is to provide hospitals for the veterans of the World War. I call the attention of the House to what it is doing if it accepts this condition. This provides that the institution in question shall be perpetually maintained and used as a camp. I am not aware that it has been the practice of the Nation to accept gifts of any sort with a string attached to them, with a proviso attempting to anticipate the future. At this very moment there are numerous State homes for veterans that have dwindling population. The purpose of giving this home to the Nation is to transfer from the State of New York to the Nation the cost of maintaining just such a home.

Mr. STALKER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUCE. Yes.

Mr. STALKER. The Board of Managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers are in need of this home. General Wood informs me that they have not any vacant beds, and that they are in urgent need of this equipment. It has the approval of the Budget Bureau and of the War Department. The Legislature of the State of New York passed the legislation giving the United States Government this home.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. STALKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time may be extended for three minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. STALKER. In the last Congress we passed an act accepting the home.

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Speaker, I thought the gentleman was generous enough to ask that I have the three minutes. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. That was the gentleman's request.

Mr. STALKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts has the floor.

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Speaker, this home is wanted, it is greatly needed, and I hope that we will get it. I do not want the House to accept anything, however, from any Commonwealth with a promise to maintain it perpetually. That is an unwise thing to do. The provision is in this bill, because the Assembly of the State of New York in its offer put in that restriction. My own judgment is that the wise thing to do is to strike out the proviso and then allow the New York Assembly to make its offer as it ought to make the offer, without any strings to it. [Applause.]

This binds us down from now until kingdom come. We are hoping that there will not be another war. If in 75 years or a hundred years from now there should not have been any war, veterans will have disappeared. You are confronted with the proposal to maintain this perpetually and use it for the purpose specified. How are your successors going to keep your pledge? The State of New York tries to turn the institution over to us because it can no longer fill the place. It is nearly empty by reason of the fact that the results of the Civil War have almost disappeared. They ask us now to take the same obligations, the same burden, the same responsibility they are trying to get rid of. The right way to do is for them to take a leaf out of their own experience and say, "We will not ask the Nation to do things which are hampering us so seriously that we are glad to shift the responsibility to somebody else."

Therefore, sir, I desire this sentence to be eliminated if my argument has the approval of the House.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I think there are many States which would be very glad to turn over such expenses to the Federal Government, and if this passes there would be quite a rush to get in line. I think the bill ought to be carefully framed, and I believe the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts ought to prevail. There is another reason, in addition to the forceful presentation which the gentleman from Massachusetts has made. It not only provides for the perpetual maintenance of this as a home, but provides for the perpetual maintenance of those who are now in it. No matter whether they conform to the rules and regulations or not, no matter what good reason there might be for not continuing them, we are bound perpetually to retain them. The board that has the management of that institution loses all control over these particular inmates. We as a favor to the State of New York are providing their maintenance at Federal expense. I hope the gentleman will accept the striking out of that sentence, as without such action this bill ought to be defeated.

Mr. STALKER. That would defeat the bill and necessitate its return to the New York State Legislature.

Mr. CRAMTON. That is a good place to return it, in my judgment.

Mr. STALKER. The gentleman can read in the report where General Wood states there is urgent need for this home.

Mr. CRAMTON. That is all very true, but that does not mean that we must place language in the bill which makes it impossible for the board of managers properly to administer the institution.

Mr. STALKER. So far as the inmates are concerned, the average age of the Civil War veterans is about 84 years.

Mr. CRAMTON. How about the average age of the Spanish War veterans?

Mr. STALKER. There are not very many in the home.

Mr. CRAMTON. This great Government is not going to turn out these veterans unless a compelling condition arises, and if that arises there ought not to be a law saying whatever the condition might be they would have to be maintained.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Would it have survived if General Wood had said he did not need this property?

Mr. STALKER. I would not have introduced the legislation. General Hines said they did not need the property, but General Wood stated that they did require it.

Mr. CRAMTON. Has General Wood said that he could not use it unless it had this sentence in the bill?

Mr. STALKER. I will say the gentleman from New York has presented this matter to the Attorney General, and is advised that he can not accept it until this language is inserted in the law.

Mr. CRAMTON. The language in the bill binds us for 40 years; perhaps, to retain up in that home certain survivors of the Spanish-American War, whether they conform to the rules and regulations of the institution or not.

Mr. STALKER. The Spanish-American War veterans are taken into any of these national homes.

Mr. CRAMTON. I am not talking about who can enter it; I am talking about the select class which this bill provides must be maintained there during their life, whether they conform to the regulations or not. In this institution these New Yorkers can be as much of a nuisance as they choose to be and still can not be put out.

Mr. STALKER. The State of New York is not trying to pass on any liability. This institution cost more than $5,000,000. It is a very complete home which they propose to give to the National Government, and something which the National Government is in urgent need of.

Mr. CRAMTON. My objection is to the sentence which the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE] moved to strike out.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I want to point out the fact that every time New York turns something over to the Federal Government it does so without consideration.

Mr. CRAMTON. But with plenty of strings to it.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. When land is accepted from another State we take the land and the conditions, too.

Mr. CRAMTON. This is a proposition offering to the Federal Government an institution to be governed perpetually, as it appears, by the State of New York.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, this bill is of more universal interest than would appear on its face, because, as the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE] has so well expressed it, the Government will be perpetually bound by this precedent. Scattered throughout the entire United States, both in the North and in the South, there are many State soldiers homes, such as the one referred to in this proposed law. In the North they are maintained for soldiers who served on the Union side in the war between the States, or the Civil War, and in the Southern States for those who served in the Confederate Army. It is apparent that the time will come when the States maintaining these State homes will desire that these institutions be turned over to the National Government in order that the soldiers of the Spanish-American War and of the World War, the sons, perhaps, of those who fought in that other great conflict may be hospitalized in their own States. If that is done the control and jurisdiction of these hospitals should rest entirely with the United States Government, and not with the individual States.

Mr. O'CONNELL. That is where it ought to be.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Yes. It is exactly where it must be, because otherwise, when these hospitals are turned over to the Federal Government they will come under 48 different State jurisdictions, if there are that many State homes.

As was pointed out by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON], there would be the question of the discipline in all these institutions; not alone in this one in New York State. I think this one should be taken over under proper legislation, but in these institutions this question of discipline might be vital. There may be one of the patients in this hospital in New York—I do not say it will actually occur, but under this phraseology it can occur—there might be a man there who was engaging in the business of selling intoxicants or narcotics to inmates of the institution or to the public, and yet with this restrictive provision in this proposed law the proper authorities in charge of that home would have no right, in my judgment, to discharge him.

I do not think that situation ought to be allowed to exist. I am not so fearful about it except as a precedent, because I do not think there will be a President of the United States with such poor judgment as to take over an institution with a provision restricting the right of the Federal Government to maintain control over the hospitals which it maintains. I assume that the present President would not do that, and I assume that the next President would not do it.

I am, however, opposed to the bill unless the restriction is eliminated. Then the measure will be returned to the Legislature of New York with the suggestion that this institution may be accepted free of restriction, and notice thereby given that every other State must comply with that rule, which, I think, is for the best interests of the United States.

Mr. JACOBSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Certainly.

Mr. JACOBSTEIN. How does this fit in with the policy of the Veterans' Bureau?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I will say that the whole question of the care of ex-service men in hospitals and soldiers' homes, in marine hospitals and hospitals of the Army and Navy and Veterans' Bureau hospitals is, in a degree, involved in this discussion. It seems to me to be vital that there should be a law passed by this Congress that will give the President of the United States the power to consolidate all these governmental agencies which are now trying to do one thing but under five different operating heads.

Mr. JACOBSTEIN. Has General Hines expressed himself on the subject?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I would not want to quote him, because I do not have the hearings before me at this moment. I would not want to quote him unless I could quote him accurately.

But my recollection of it is that he said he did not need this hospital at the present time and that he has said he did not want it with these restrictive clauses in the act authorizing its acceptance.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from South Dakota has expired. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. STALKER) there were—ayes 81, noes 13.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

COMMISSIONER OF INDIAN AFFAIRS

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 13506) fixing the salary of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs and the Assistant Commissioners of Indian Affairs.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I want to inquire if these salaries were not fixed in the recent Welch bill or in the other classifications we have had?

Mr. LEAVITT. The status here is just as it was in the case of the Commissioner of Reclamation. It is necessary to have this law passed in order to increase the salaries of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs and the Assistant Commissioner of Indian Affairs.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Are there not some other employees in this department whose salaries have not been adjusted?

Mr. LEAVITT. They have been adjusted so far as they are under civil service and come within the different classifications, but these positions do not.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Do not the commissioner and assistant commissioner come within the $9,000 class?

Mr. LEAVITT. No.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. What is the commissioner getting?

Mr. LEAVITT. Eight thousand dollars.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. What do other heads of departments doing the same work and of the same dignity, if you please, receive now?

Mr. LEAVITT. Perhaps the best illustration is that of the Commissioner of Reclamation, who by an act like this had his salary increased to these same figures, and that was done by the last Congress.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, what does the Commissioner of the General Land Office receive?

Mr. LEAVITT. I can not tell the gentleman .

Mr. BLACK of Texas. At the last session of Congress the Welch bill was passed and that bill provided for a new classification of salaries up to $9,000, as I recollect, and I assume that this commissioner has had his salary increased to that amount, and if he has I shall certainly object.

Mr. LEAVITT. These positions do not come under the civil service and they are not reached by the Welch Act.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Are they not affected at all by the Welch bill?

Mr. LEAVITT. I think not.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Is there anyone who can give us that information? If not, and until we get that information, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

Mr. LEAVITT. I object, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. LAGUARDIA, Mr. SCHAFER, and Mr. SPROUL of Kansas objected.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE ST. CROIX RIVER

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 13502) authorizing the State of Minnesota to construct, maintain, and operate a free highway bridge across the St. Croix River at or near Stillwater, Minn.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in order to facilitate interstate commerce, improve the Postal Service, and provide for military and other purposes, the State of Minnesota be and is hereby authorized to construct, maintain, and operate a free highway bridge and approaches thereto across the St. Croix River at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, at or near Stillwater, Minn., in accordance with the provisions of an act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. There is hereby conferred upon the State of Minnesota all such rights and powers to enter upon lands and to acquire, condemn, occupy, possess, and use real estate and other property needed for the location, construction, operation, and maintenance of such bridge and its approaches as are possessed by railroad corporations for railroad purposes or by bridge corporations for bridge purposes in the State in which such real estate or other property is situated, upon making just compensation therefor, to be ascertained and paid according to the laws of such State, and the proceedings therefor shall be the same as in the condemnation or expropriation of property for public purposes in such State.

SEC. 3. The right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

Mr. ANDRESEN. Mr. Speaker, I offer certain amendments.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Minnesota offers amendments which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendments offered by Mr. ANDRESEN: Page 1, line 5, after the word "Minnesota," insert the words "and the State of Wisconsin."

Page 1, line 5, after the word "and" strike out the word "is," and insert in lieu thereof the word "are."

Page 2, line 2, after the word "Minnesota," insert the words "and the State of Wisconsin."

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

The title was amended.

HALF HOLIDAYS FOR CERTAIN GOVERNMENT EMPLOYEES

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (S. 3116), providing for half holidays for certain Government exployees.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It takes three objections.

Mr. WOOD and Mr. CRAMTON also objected.

FEDERAL FARM LOAN ACT

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 13936) to amend the second paragraph of section 4 of the Federal farm loan act, as amended.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I want to make some inquiry as to the reference. In line 13, page 2, the bill provides that the borrower shall be subject to the restrictions and provisions of this act. When this is written into law, because the bill is simply an amendment of existing law, it seems to me it ought to refer to the provisions of chapter 7 of title 12 of the United States Code.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. I would suggest to the gentleman that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MCFADDEN] has this bill in charge and I think it would be well to pass it over without prejudice.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Then I make that request, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection the bill will be passed over without prejudice.

There was no objection.

INDIAN LANDS IN OKLAHOMA

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 13507) to amend section 3 of Public Act. No. 230 (37 Stat. L., 194).

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to know definitely how far-reaching this bill is. I have not had an opportunity to check back with the old legislation. Apparently, this takes the lid off as to our responsibility for such assessments anywhere in Oklahoma. Is that true or is our liability going to be limited to this $2,720?

Mr. SWANK. Mr. Speaker, my understanding is it will be limited to that amount. When the ditch was constructed in the first place, the law was $15 an acre. The department says that it now requires, under the increased cost of this sort of work, about $18.50 an acre.

Mr. CRAMTON. I do not worry so much about that increase of $3 an acre.

Mr. SWANK. My understanding is it is limited to the amount which the gentleman has stated.

Mr. CRAMTON. The first sentence as it stands in the bill before us says that the Secretary is authorized to approve the assessments, and so forth, "upon all other restricted Indian allotments situated within any drainage district located within and organized under the laws of the State of Oklahoma."

Mr. LEAVITT. That is the present law.

Mr. CRAMTON. That is a repetition of the present law? There is no expansion there?

Mr. LEAVITT. And I might call the gentleman's attention to this paragraph in the report of the Secretary:

As the provisions of H. R. 13507 are deemed adequate for the protection of the interests of the United States and will result in considerable benefit to the Indians in interest, it is recommended that the proposed legislaion receive your favorable consideration.

Mr. CRAMTON. I just wanted to be sure how adequate it is, and under the gentleman's statement I have no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the second paragraph of section 3 of Public Act No. 230 (37 Stat. L. 194), approved July 19, 1912, being an act to provide for the payment of drainage assessments on Indian lands in Oklahoma, be, and the same is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized, in his discretion, to approve the assessments, together with right-of-way maps, upon all other restricted Indian allotments situated within any drainage district located within and organized under the laws of the State of Oklahoma: Provided, That the limitation prescribed in section 2 hereof that no assessments shall exceed the sum of $15 per acre on any allotment or portion thereof shall not apply to assessments approved hereunder: Provided further, That for the purpose of paying such assessments approved by the Secretary of the Interior March 21, 1928, against restricted lands within the Little River drainage district No. 2, Cleveland County, Okla., there is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $2,720.94, to be reimbursable as provided in section 2 of this act."

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

IOWA TRIBE OF INDIANS

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the resolution (S. J. Res. 139) for the relief of the Iowa Tribe of Indians.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, this bill revolves around the terms of paragraph 6 of the amended petition filed in behalf of these Indians, but the report does not set out what paragraph 6 deals with.

The report of the department indicates that the matter affected is this additional 49,153 acres; but I would feel much easier if I could see what paragraph 6 is and see what is included in that paragraph. Has the gentleman from Montana that paragraph at hand?

Mr. LEAVITT. I have not it here. I would be perfectly willing to have this go over and take it up the next time.

Mr. CRAMTON. That would be fine. I do not expect to object to it, but I would like to see that paragraph.

I will ask that the bill be passed over without prejudice, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the bill will be passed over without prejudice.

There was no objection.

BRIDGE ACROSS MONONGAHELA RIVER

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 14146) granting the consent of Congress to the county of Allegheny, Pa., to construct a bridge across the Monongahela River, in the city of Pittsburgh, Allegheny County, Pa.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I simply do this for the purpose of inquiring whether the grant should be given to Allegheny County, since you had a consolidation in your city, I believe, last year. I know, for instance, in our city the counties within the city would not have the right after consolidation to build a bridge. I am simply calling the gentleman's attention to it.

Mr. PORTER. The consolidation has not taken place.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I thought it had.

Mr. PORTER. No.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I simply wanted to make that inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

Mr. BURTNESS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. I think it is generally understood that these bills will be read, and I think in this instance there are one or two amendments. The Clerk will read the bill.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the consent of Congress is hereby granted to the county of Allegheny, in the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, and its successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the Monongahela River, at a point suitable to the interest of navigation, approximately 1.5 miles above its junction with the Allegheny River, in the city of Pittsburgh, county of Allegheny, and State of Pennsylvania, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 1, line 4, strike out the words "and its successors and assigns";

Line 6, before the word "bridge" insert the words "free highway";

Line 7, strike out the word "interest" and insert the word "interests."

The committee amendments were agreed to, and the bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SCHAFER. If the gentleman will refer to page 2 of the committee report he will see the following language in the report from the Department of Agriculture:

This bill would authorize the Rio Grande del Norte Investment Co., its successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the Rio Grande River at or near San Benito, Tex. San Benito is on the system of Federal-aid highways approved for the State of Texas, and a bridge across the Rio Grande at this point would draw its traffic almost exclusively from the Federal-aid highway system. The department therefore would recommend that a private toll bridge at this point be not authorized.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. There is not a public highway within 5 miles of where this bridge is to be built. San Benito is 7 miles, as I recall, from the river; there is no village; there are no houses and there is no town on either side of the river. This is for the purpose of accommodating commerce and individuals who desire to go into Mexico and return from Mexico.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The weakness of the gentleman's bill is that it makes no provision whatsoever for the amortization of the cost of the bridge and ultimately taking the bridge over by the State.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Certainly not; and you could not do that by virtue of the fact that you would have to have the consent of the Mexican Government. This is a bridge across an international stream. Five bridges have been built between Laredo and Brownsville, and I think that is conducive to commerce between the two countries, and it certainly takes away any opportunity of monopoly.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. We had a similar situation not very long ago, and the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON] succeeded in negotiating very favorable terms, and we wrote into the bill a proviso for the amortization of the cost of the bridge and for the taking over of the bridge at the end of a certain period.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Suppose the State of Texas should take over this bridge; Mexico, being on the other end of it, would collect all the money. You can not amortize the cost of a bridge over an international stream.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. No; but this is a private company that is asking for a permit from Congress.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Certainly. Suppose this private company amortized its investment and then the bridge became the property, we will say, of the State of Texas, the price would be the same.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The price would be the same, but the gentleman does not mean to say that Mexico would refuse to come to an agreement with the United States?

Mr. GARNER of Texas. I do not see why Mexico should do that and thus not be able to put the money into the coffers of its treasury.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The answer to that is that the bridge has two ends.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. I understand it has, and they could stop traffic on the bridge; I will admit that; but the price would be the same. Neither Government can control the price or what shall be charged for crossing that bridge.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. But when we are asked to grant a permit of this kind we can make provisions which will ultimately enable us to protect the users of the bridge, the same as the gentleman from Michigan did with reference to the bridge on the Canadian border.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. I do not know how you can protect it. Suppose the State of Texas owned the bridge and did not want to charge any tolls on it. The only way it could keep from charging tolls would be to have the Mexican Government agree not to charge any tolls; and if they did not agree to that, the Mexican Government would get all the money and put it in their coffers. Therefore you pay the same price without any American being benefited by it.

Mr. SCHAFER. Does the gentleman know the officers of this company? I notice the gentleman has four or five similar bridge bills now on the calendar.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Yes; I can tell the gentleman. This is private capital raised in the city of San Benito. There is a bridge at Brownsville and there is one at Mercedes just being completed. This is about 60 miles between these two points, and the citizens of San Benito want to have your folks, when they come down there, stop in San Benito before going across the river into Mexico. The chamber of commerce and people of the city of San Benito got together and raised sufficient money to build a bridge across the river from San Benito. They want the people who come that way to cross the river at this point rather than be compelled to go to Mercedes or Brownsville.

Mr. SCHAFER. Then the incorporators of this company are not the incorporators of the other bridge companies?

Mr. GARNER of Texas. No, sir; they are different people entirely, and I will tell you about the others. The Donna Bridge Co. is composed of different people entirely and the bridge company at Rio Grande City is composed of the leading citizens of that city. They have a bridge 10 miles above them at Roma and the people of the city of Rio Grande do not want everybody to run up to Roma and go across the river, but want them to spend a while in Rio Grande city. These bridges are swinging bridges and only cost about $75,000 or $100,000.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Then they could be amortized in five or ten years?

Mr. GARNER of Texas. That would depend on the traffic and what you could get out of it. When it comes to amortizing a matter of this kind, it is a question of what profit you can make.

Mr. HUDSPETH. There is no complaint from the people down there about the building of these bridges. The people down there want them built and used for the purpose of carrying on the commerce and so they can trade back and forth.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Yes. There is no complaint about it at all.

Mr. HUDSPETH. I have had six or eight of these concerns created in El Paso and they are created so they can trade back and forth.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The gentleman will understand that if we take a position on some of these bills we will have to take the same position with reference to all of them.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. But this is a bridge across a river into a foreign country. I agree that there is very good reason for looking into the matter of tolls on bridges in this country because they become monopolies, but there is not a single one of these bridges where there is a highway touching it. There is not even a ferry there at the present time.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Does the gentleman contend that the Department of Agriculture is wrong in their statement in this report?

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Yes; they thought there was a bridge at San Benito. The bridge is six miles away.

Mr. SCHAFER. Does not the gentleman think this bill ought to go over until a further report can be obtained from the department?

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Of course, if the gentleman insists on it.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill may go over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Does the gentleman desire or intend to make the same request with respect to the other three bridge bills?

Mr. SCHAFER. Yes.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. YATES. Mr. Speaker, I am very much interested in Calendar No. 1049 (H. R. 7206), a bill to establish a national war memorial museum and veterans' headquarters in the building known as Ford's Theater, which bill was introduced by our lamented late colleague, Mr. Rathbone. Do I understand that that is not in order to-day?

The SPEAKER. It is not eligible to be called to-day. The rule distinctly provides that only bills can be called up that have been on the calendar for three days.

Mr. BURTNESS. Mr. Speaker, I understood one of the other Members intended to ask unanimous consent that Calendar No. 1047 (S. J. Res. 59), authorizing the President to ascertain, adjust, and pay certain claims of grain elevators and grain firms to cover insurance and interest on wheat during the years 1919 and 1920 might be considered to-day.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would feel it his duty to ask whether a strong emergency exists in respect to it before recognizing anyone to make such a request. If there was no such emergency, the Chair would decline to entertain such a request.

Mr. BURTNESS. I do not know what the attitude of the committee handling the bill is. It was stricken from the calendar two weeks ago. It was through inadvertance that the bill was not placed earlier upon this calendar.

The SPEAKER. This bill has already been stricken from the calendar.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. It was at my instance that the bill was stricken from the calendar. I went into the matter, and I understand that an amendment will be offered providing that the Comptroller General will do the investigating.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. That is correct.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think that that creates a sufficient emergency, and in accordance with the practice of the Chair he would refuse to recognize anyone to make the request for unanimous consent that it be considered to-day.

FIRST DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 15848) making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in certain appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929, and prior fiscal years, to provide urgent supplemental appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Indiana that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the first deficiency appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the first deficiency appropriation bill, with Mr. LEHLBACH in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The first paragraph having been read, the Clerk will proceed with the reading of the bill under the 5-minute rule.

The Clerk read as follows:

Interior Department.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. ANTHONY: Page 6, after line 7, insert the following:

"SOLICITOR'S OFFICE

"For an additional amount for personal services, fiscal year 1929, $1,720."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

International Conference for the Safety of Life at Sea: For the expenses of participation by the United States in the International Conference for the Revision of the Convention of 1914 for the Safety of Life at Sea, as authorized by Public Resolution No. 70, approved December 7, 1928, including travel and subsistence or per diem in lieu of subsistence (notwithstanding the provisions of any other act), compensation of employees, stenographic and other services by contract if deemed necessary, rent of offices, purchase of necessary books and documents, printing and binding, printing of official visiting cards, and such other expenses as may be authorized by the Secretary of State, $90,000, to remain available until June 30, 1930.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 11, after line 18, insert as a separate paragraph the following: "Water boundary, United States and Mexico: Any unexpended balance on June 30, 1929, of the appropriation, water boundary, United States and Mexico, 1928 and 1929, contained in the act approved February 10, 1928 (45 Stat. 60), shall continue available for the same purposes during the fiscal year 1930."

Mr. HUDSPETH. Mr. Chairman, I had an amendment covering the same proposition.

Mr. ANTHONY. That is satisfactory to the committee.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

JUDICIAL

United States Court for China: For an additional amount for compensation of the judge as provided by law for the fiscal years that follow:

For 1928, $166.66;

For 1929, $2,000.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 11, after line 24, insert as a new paragraph the following: "Prisons for American convicts: The appropriations for prison for American convicts for the fiscal year 1928–29 are hereby made available for like expenses which have been or may be incurred in Morocco and Ethiopia during those fiscal years, respectively."

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, under the ruling of the Comptroller General the appropriations for the current year are not available to pay for United States prisons in Ethiopia or Morocco, and this is for the purpose of maintaining United States prisoners in those far distant places.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT

BUREAU OF INTERNAL REVENUE

Refunding taxes illegally collected: For an additional amount for refunding taxes illegally or erroneously collected, as provided by law, including the payment of claims for the fiscal year 1929 and prior years, $75,000,000: Provided, That a report shall be made to Congress by internal-revenue districts, and alphabetically arranged, of all disbursements hereunder in excess of $500 as required by section 3 of the act of May 29, 1928 (45 Stat. 996), including the names of all persons and corporations to whom such payments are made, together with the amount paid to each.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "each," in line 12, page 12, strike out the period, insert a colon, and add the following: "Provided, That no part of the appropriation herein made shall be available for paying any tax refund in excess of $75,000 which has not been approved by the Joint Committee on Internal Revenue Taxation."

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order on the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman state his point of order?

Mr. BYRNS. What is the point of order?

Mr. ANTHONY. As I heard the amendment read it is new legislation.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. The present law requires them to make a report to Congress.

Mr. ANTHONY. I do not think the present law requires the committee to approve. The amendment would require the approval of the joint committee, which is contrary to existing law.

Mr. HUDSON. May we have the amendment read again?

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be again reported.

There was no objection.

The amendment was again reported.

Mr. BYRNS. I am perfectly well aware of the rule which forbids any legislation being placed upon an appropriation bill under the guise of a limitation.

But it strikes me that the rule does not apply to an amendment of this kind. It is true that the law creating the Joint Committee on Internal Revenue Taxation does not provide for the approval or disapproval of the joint committee. Of course, Congress is not under any obligation to make an appropriation for the purpose of refunding taxes, but, if Congress undertakes in this particular instance to appropriate $75,000,000 for the purpose of refunding certain taxes settled by the Treasury Department, it would seem to me that it should have a perfect right to create the conditions under which those refunds shall be made. It is not a change of the general law; it is simply providing that, in so far as this particular appropriation is concerned, none of it shall be expended unless the Committee on Internal Revenue Taxation has approved, in so far as claims over $75,000 are concerned.

Mr. SNELL. That would prohibit the Secretary of the Treasury from paying these claims that are over that amount?

Mr. BYRNS. Yes; over $75,000.

Mr. SNELL. That is giving instructions to the Secretary of the Treasury, and it is not in order on an appropriation bill. It is clearly out of order.

Mr. BYRNS. It is clearly a limitation on the particular appropriation about to be made by Congress.

Mr. SNELL. That does not limit the amount appropriated at all. It does not reduce the amount carried in this bill and that would be paid out under the bill, but it gives definite instructions to the Secretary of the Treasury not to do certain things. That is definite legislation on an appropriation bill and is not in order.

Mr. BYRNS. I do not think in a case where a specific appropriation is made for a definite purpose Congress is prohibited under the rule from laying down the conditions under which that appropriation may be expended, because Congress, if it chose to do so, could refuse to make any appropriation to meet such purpose. But if it chooses to make this appropriation, it can say that it shall be expended in a certain way.

Mr. SNELL. We can not pass an appropriation with a limitation on the discretion of an executive officer.

Mr. BYRNS. This does not limit his discretion or place new duties on the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. SNELL. It is a definite instruction, and that is against the rules of the House.

Mr. BYRNS. In so far as this particular appropriation is concerned, not as to his general duties.

Mr. SNELL. It limits his discretion.

Mr. BYRNS. It says to him that, "So far as this appropriation is concerned, you must first have the approval of the joint committee before you expend it." If the Congress should adopt an amendment of this kind it would be tantamount to saying we will not make an appropriation under any other condition.

Mr. SNELL. It is beyond the authority of Congress and against the rules of the House.

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Chairman, while this amendment starts out as a limitation, yet before it is completed it changes existing law in this respect: Everybody who is acquainted with the law creating this joint committee of the House and Senate to review these assessments knows that that committee has no power either to approve or disapprove. That is the law now. If this amendment is adopted it will change the law so as to make it impossible for the Secretary of the Treasury to pay any of these assessments until he receives the approval of the joint committee, which is a distinct change of law.

Mr. MORTON D. HULL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD. Certainly.

Mr. MORTON D. HULL. It would really make this committee a tribunal for the hearing of these cases?

Mr. WOOD. Yes; it would make it an appeal board.

Mr. SNELL. I wish to direct the Chair to section 825 of the Manual, which, in substance, says that limitations shall not be offered directly governing the official functions of an executive officer, and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] admits that this would be a limitation on the functions of the Secretary of the Treasury. Therefore it would be in violation of the rules of the House.

Mr. BLACK of New York. Mr. Chairman, in a decision rendered by the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON] respecting an amendment offered by myself, I think in the Sixty-ninth Congress, first session, where I offered an amendment to the independent offices appropriation bill providing that no part of a certain appropriation should be expended in a private shipyard, the Chairman ruled my amendment out of order without citing a precedent. Before adjournment he called me to the Speaker's desk and told me that after an examination of the precedents he found that my amendment was in order. I called up the amendment to that section later, and the Chairman ruled then that the amendment was in order.

Mr. SNELL. This amendment restricts the functions of an executive officer.

Mr. BLACK of New York. We can either appropriate or not appropriate, and in that case the amendment provided that there should be no payment to a private shipyard.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. It is a well-known rule of the House that amendments which limit expenditures of money appropriated for a general purpose by excluding some specific purpose embraced in the general purpose are in order, but the rule is clear that such limitation to be in order must simply forbid the use of the money for a certain given purpose. It is the rule that anything carrying an affirmative, substantive change in existing law, that limits the functions or jurisdiction of an executive officer so drastically as to constitute a change of policy, or that imposes upon a governmental agency new duties not imposed upon it by law, is beyond the definition of a limitation and is, therefore, not in order.

The amendment under consideration provides that no tax refunds shall be paid by the Treasury Department in excess of $75,0000 which have not been approved by the Joint Committee on Internal Revenue Taxation. In the first place, ever since the existing income tax law has been in force the Treasury Department has had full discretion in making refunds where it was found that taxes had been improperly paid. To subject that function to the review of another body which has not at present that function is new legislation, involving an important change of policy, and is such a limitation on existing rights and powers of the Secretary of the Treasury as to constitute new legislation.

The point that remains, which is governing, in the mind of the Chair, is that it imposes upon the Joint Committee on Internal Revenue Taxation a function that is not now imposed upon it by law, and this incumbent of the Chair has repeatedly held that such imposition of new duties, in the guise of a limitation, is not in order. The Chair will cite but one precedent and that precedent, the Chair thinks, will be given weight by every Member of this House because of the person who handed down the decision, a person who is still a Member of this House and one whose knowledge of parliamentary law and whose clarity in expounding it is unquestioned. I read from a decision rendered by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] in the Sixty-fourth Congress, on March 11, 1916:

> But such limitations must not give affirmative directions and must not impose new duties upon an executive officer of the Government.

Now, whether it is an executive officer or a legislative body, an agency of the Government must not, in the form of a limitation, have imposed new duties. Therefore the amendment is held out of order.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Chairman, I offer another amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Amendment offered by Mr. BYRNS: After the word "each," in line 12, page 12, strike out the period, insert a semicolon, and add the following: "Provided, That no part of the appropriation herein made shall be available for paying any tax refund in excess of $75,000."

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Chairman, I regret that a point of order was made against the amendment which I previously offered, but I feel very sure that if the House adopts this amendment a way will be provided whereby the House can be given some information which will enable it to act intelligently upon the large settlements that are being made by the Treasury Department in the way of tax refunds.

As was said upon Saturday, the legislation which was finally adopted with reference to the creation of the Joint Committee on Internal Revenue Taxation, composed of Members of the Senate and Members of the House, was a matter of compromise; but I can not bring myself to the idea that there was any Member of the Congress who voted to appropriate $40,000 a year, and more than that sum, for the employment of experts to consider these reports or settlements of more than $75,000, with any other idea save that the committee would give some attention to those settlements and advise the Congress and also the Treasury Department as to its conclusions. Certainly it seems to me to be an entire waste of money to appropriate more than $40,000 every year to employ experts and then to take the position that the joint committee is nothing more than a committee to receive the returns and send them back to the Treasury within 30 days. We are not justified, it seems to me, in appropriating money for the payment of experts unless they do perform some function.

I dare say there are no Members of the House, unless it be the members of this joint committee, who feel within themselves that they have sufficient information to say that these settlements should be allowed, or are willing, as individual Members of the House, to approve them; as we will approve them and as we do approve them when we vote this appropriation. That is said without any intention to reflect upon the Treasury Department or anyone else, but the facts are that you and I are here called upon by a vote for this appropriation to thereby expressly approve the settlements made by the Treasury Department in excess of $75,000, which will be paid out of this sum, when as we know, and as was said on a previous day when this bill was under discussion, the joint committee with this great force of experts, after a hearing upon one of the claims expressly refused, after a motion was made, to go upon record as approving it.

Now, it seems to me there can be no objection and should be no objection upon the part of the Treasury Department, and certainly not upon the part of any Member of Congress, to the adoption of this amendment, which will undoubtedly bring about an examination of these settlements of over $75,000, so that when we come to act we can at least act with the assurance that Members of this House charged with that particular duty have passed on them and have approved them after investigation. Now, Mr. Bond, in his hearing before the subcommittee——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Bond, in his testimony before the Subcommittee on Appropriations, stated that after these reports were returned by the joint committee they were paid. Of course, they must be returned within 30 days.

What is the object, gentlemen, in sending them up here to this joint committee? Of course, they say it is for publicity purposes. You can have publicity without that. Why provide experts at a cost of over $40,000 a year if it is only for publicity, when a clerk could receive them and afford the newspapers of the country and the other inquiring citizens opportunity to see them, if publicity is all that is to be expected?

But it is said that possibly there is another object. It is expected that these experts shall examine them, and then if they find there is anything wrong with them, report that to the Treasury Department. If this be true, when they find nothing is wrong with them why not make that report to the Treasury Department and at least give you and me the satisfaction of knowing that when we vote to make this immense appropriation, involving twenty-odd million dollars to some and six and a half million dollars to another big interest in this country, and millions to others, that the matter at least has been investigated by those who share with you and with me equal responsibility in connection with the money in the Treasury and our duty to the taxpayer.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. How long have these experts of the joint committee had these particular refund cases before them for consideration?

Mr. BYRNS. The law provides that they shall be sent to the joint committee and returned within 30 days, according to my recollection.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. That is the returning feature, but how long have they had to actually examine them?

Mr. BYRNS. I could not say to the gentleman. I do not know just when they were sent up, but I take it they are sent up immediately after the finding is made in the Treasury Department and then interest stops running for 30 days. At the end of the 30 days, the Treasury Department proceeds to pay them.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Are they all sent at one time?

Mr. BYRNS. No; they are sent up as they are settled in the Treasury Department and are sent at different times.

This is the whole object of the amendment. It is just the simple proposition of whether we, acting here upon our reponsibility as Members of Congress, representing not only those who are entitled to these refunds, but representing the taxpayers and the Treasury of our Government, shall insist that we have some information before we vote this immense sum out of the Treasury.

This does not affect any small taxpayer. Anyone who has had a settlement made with him under $75,000 will be able to receive the money if this amendment is adopted.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Will the gentleman yield for a suggestion?

Mr. BYRNS. Yes.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Will not every stockholder of the 25,000 stockholders of the United States Steel Corporation, for instance, be affected by this limitation?

Mr. BYRNS. Oh, undoubtedly.

Mr. DEMPSEY. And would not that be true of any corporation which has a refund, or is entitled to a refund, above $75,000?

Mr. BYRNS. The gentleman has referred to the Steel Corporation. I had referred to none in particular, but does the gentleman think that the Steel Corporation will be very seriously affected financially if a few weeks are consumed in considering the settlement made by the Treasury Department?

Mr. DEMPSEY. If the gentleman concedes, as his question does concede, that at the end of a few weeks this is to be paid and we are simply to discuss it as a formal question meaning nothing, but we are going to pay it when we have discussed it for a few weeks——

Mr. BYRNS. Oh, no; I do not concede that at all.

Mr. DEMPSEY. That is what the gentleman's question implies.

Mr. BYRNS. No.

Mr. DEMPSEY. If that is so, then, of course, it will not affect the stockholders of the Steel Corporation.

Mr. BYRNS. Oh, no.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has again expired.

Mr. BYRNS. Just two minutes more, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to proceed for two additional minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BYRNS. The gentleman rather puts words in my mouth, because certainly what I said could not be construed as the gentleman undertakes to construe it.

My whole position is that these claims should be sent up here to the joint committee, and that this joint committee, which is provided with experts at the expense of the Treasury of the United States, should be required to function just as I think all of you, when you voted this appropriation, expected it to function; because if you did not expect this, then you were voting money out of the Treasury uselessly and for no purpose whatever. You might just as well have provided it with one clerk to receive these reports, to give them that publicity which you say was intended, and then send them immediately back to the Treasury Department. That is all this proposition involves; and I say that one of these experts—and my information is obtained from the hearings—the head of the expert force of the investigating committee, stated he could examine this entire Steel Corporation report in 60 days.

Mr. DEMPSEY. How long after the adjournment of the present session of Congress?

Mr. BYRNS. He said he could do it in 60 days.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Does not the gentleman from Tennessee realize that if we gave him 60 days that would mean 4 or 5 days after this session of Congress had adjourned? In other words, the gentleman thinks that some time during some future session he might be able to report.

Mr. BYRNS. Well, I know this: It took the Treasury Department 11 years to pass upon this claim, and during all that time it was bearing interest, which now amounts to more than $11,000,000 upon a claim of $15,000,000. It seems to me, under these circumstances, it is not unreasonable that we, as Members of Congress, called upon to vote this immense sum of money, should have the experts provided for this joint committee given 60 days in order to pass upon it and give the Congress the benefit of their findings as to the correctness or incorrectness of these large settlements.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has again expired.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, I think that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] is extremely arbitrary. Under it a claim for $74,999 could be approved and paid, but if it were for $75,001 the Treasury could not pay it.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. When Congress passed the law creating this joint committee it fixed an arbitrary rule in respect to $75,000.

Mr. ANTHONY. Oh, no; it did not. It fixed an arbitrary rule under which the joint committee could get the facts in regard to a claim.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Yes.

Mr. ANTHONY. And did not say that the claim should not be paid.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. If we fix an arbitrary rule now it would correspond with the arbitrary rule fixed by Congress when we created that joint committee.

Mr. ANTHONY. Furthermore, if the amendment should be agreed to it would place the United States Government in a decidedly unfair situation, in a position that I do not believe any citizen should ask it to occupy, because the Government does not want to take an unfair advantage in its transactions with the taxpayers. What would happen if the amendment should prevail? It means that when a case is taken into the Treasury Department for payment of additional taxes and determined the Government must promptly demand that the taxpayer pay at once, with interest running from the date of that demand. There is no escape for Mr. Taxpayer; he must pay. What happens if the shoe is on the other foot? Under the proposed amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee, if the amount exceeds $75,000 you tie the claim up for an interminable period, and you can not pay it at all. It is not fair, it is not equitable, it would not stand before any fair-minded tribunal. That is the first objection to it.

The practical effect of it would be to prevent use of most of the money carried in the bill for tax refunds. It means that a number of very deserving taxpayers would be deprived of their money. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] and other gentlemen who have taken an interest in this item are undoubtedly striving to prevent payment to the United States Steel Corporation. If it is any satisfaction to them, I might say that I have had information from the Treasury Department that that claim was in process of payment this morning, and it is probably all paid by now out of the funds available from the balance appropriated for this fiscal year.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I shall discuss very briefly the amendment proposed and the objections offered by the distinguished gentleman from Texas, my very good friend Mr. GARNER, on Saturday. The first question is as to this amendment. The amendment proposes that no payment shall be made under these refund provisions until the joint committee has approved. In order to appreciate what that means, let us see what the situation is as to refunds. I find that the refunds have averaged in amount from $609,000 in 1916 to $142,000,000 in 1928, and anyone who is at all familiar with the situation will find that most of these refunds are to large corporations, such as the United States Steel Corporation, where the report is a tremendously involved one, where, as in the case of the United States Steel Corporation, there are 195 subsidiaries, and all of the reports of these various subsidiaries are included in one consolidated report. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] says that it is a curious thing and a very extraordinary thing that these refunds are all made to big corporations. That is not only not a curious thing, but it is an inevitable thing. Can you make these refunds to the man who runs a lunch counter, or a peanut stand, or who is a news vender? Of course, the large refunds have to be made to the large taxpayers, and the large taxpayers are the large corporations. So that that criticism is a criticism of what is inevitable, not an unnatural but an absolutely natural thing. You make large refunds to the men who have paid large taxes.

Let us see what the history in a general way is of refunds and back collections. We find that every year during the years since the income tax law was enacted there have been refunds and there have been collections. We have the exact figures for several years, and we find that in no year has the amount of the refunds been one-half, 50 per cent, of the back collections. The United States Steel Corporation we may take as an illustration. The tax we have before us is the tax for 1917. If the Democrats are going to insist, if my distinguished friend from Texas is going to insist that we shall be blamed, as for something culpable and wrong, for making refunds, then he also must give us credit for back collections, because these collections are for Democratic years just as much as refunds are for Democratic years. So give us the full credit. Remember, each year we have made a refund of $1 we have collected for the years of Democratic administration at least $2 in every instance, and under the table that I will present something more than $2.

Let us take the next question. Ought we to approve any such amendment as that suggested? I think the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER], who said that he is proud of the House of Representatives, and I believe he is, will pause and consider most seriously and thoughtfully before he advocates any such legislation, for that is what it is. Those of you who have served here for a long time will remember that many years ago Mr. GILLETT, now Senator, and before he became Speaker of this House, came down into the pit here and made a long speech upon the never-ending controversy for governmental authority and control between the executive and the legislative branches of the Government.

And analyzing that at great length Senator GILLETT said that the substantial way in which the House of Representatives maintains its standing, its prestige, its influence against the spectacular and captivating appeal of popular Presidents like President Roosevelt was through the fact that after all it had control of the purse strings of the Government. Now the gentleman from Georgia on Saturday said, Ah, yes, but that is not a constitutional provision; it is only the growth of an immemorial, uninterrupted, continued, wise system, and so the gentleman from Texas, about to become the leader of his party, about to lead one of the two great parties in this House of which he is proud, starts his career or would start his career if he advocates this thing, which I do not believe he can seriously advocate, by asking for a surrender of the greatest privilege and source of jurisdiction of this House, because the instant you say that the Senate may join with us in determining whether or not we shall appropriate that instant you break up this custom, you lose its force, its continuity, you make the Senate a sharer with the House in what up to this time has been recognized to be the sole prerogative of the House. Then, second, one of the committees of which we are justly proud, one of the great committees of this House is the Committee on Appropriations, and the gentleman would also deprive that committee of functioning and determining matters which are brought before it and would send such matters to a joint committee composed of Members of the Senate as well as Members of the House. This shows how impractical, how useless, how senseless, and how theoretical all this legislation would be.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. DEMPSEY. I will.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Speaking for myself, I will accept an amendment, if it is possible, by providing that before this $75,000, or anything in the case, shall be paid this joint committee shall make recommendation to the Appropriations Committee of the House of Representatives, and——

Mr. DEMPSEY. That does not cure it.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Thus giving the Appropriations Committee information as well as giving it jurisdiction.

Mr. DEMPSEY. No; that does not cure it. It still makes this House and that committee subject to the voice of the Senate. You are going out of your way to say we should abolish a time-honored custom, we shall take that away from this House, that we shall give up that which gives it the most influence and prestige and surrender it voluntarily, holding it out to the Senate. Now, the gentleman knows as a lawyer how useless, how senseless, that amendment would be. Here is a case—the United States Steel refund case—which has taken the Treasury Department 10 years to consider, a case with truckloads of evidence. Now, the gentleman asked the House on Saturday, Are you prepared to go to your constituents and say to them you voted for that without knowing anything about it? Let us see whether that question amounts to anything. Does the gentleman in good faith say that it would be possible for any man on the floor, if he devoted 60 days, 90 days, or six months to the consideration——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DEMPSEY. I ask for five additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. DEMPSEY. The gentleman knows well at the end of six months the Members of this House, every one, would be in the same condition they are to-day. He knows it is impracticable. He knows it is impossible for them to study a case like that, even to begin to comprehend the facts. So I say from that standpoint it is utterly useless.

Mr. SCHAFER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEMPSEY. I will.

Mr. SCHAFER. Then, what is the necessity for spending $40,000 of the people's money each year for the experts for the joint committee?

Mr. DEMPSEY. I think probably those experts are as able and competent men as can be found. The gentleman from Texas and the gentleman from Tennessee say that in the course of 60 days Mr. Parker might be able to report some knowledge of this particular case.

Neither one of them claims that any Member of the House would know anything more than he does to-day, and what these gentlemen suggest is this: That instead of taking the word of the Treasury Department, upon which we have relied for all these years since the income tax law was adopted and which has been followed by uniform and marvelous success in the collecting of back taxes which were not paid under a Democratic administration to the amount of over $2 for every dollar refunded—I say, instead of relying upon them who are our constitutional advisers, and whose advice we have found so useful and so helpful, we shall rely upon a subordinate employee of a committee about whom no Member of this House, except members of the joint committee, knows anything; whereas every taxpayer and every citizen of the United States knows Andrew Mellon.

Practically every one of them knows David Blair. Everyone has found by experience that he can rely upon them and trust them, and has found that the general public throughout this country rely on them. Who knows Mr. Parker? I am not saying that Mr. Parker is not an admirable man and a good expert, but I am saying nobody knows him. On the other hand, we do know these other two men, and we trust them because we have found that we have the right to trust them.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEMPSEY. Yes.

Mr. SCHAFER. If we follow the gentleman's argument to a logical conclusion, we should necessarily abolish this committee and thus save the taxpayers $40,000 a year.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Oh, no. The committee, perhaps, is useful to a certain extent. It does give a means of publicity to these claims, and it does give a means of investigation. It is, perhaps, to a certain extent helpful. But you can not afford to push the jurisdiction or work of this committee any further than we have gone. I am sure the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] would not want to surrender the prestige and the power and prerogatives which this House now possesses by any such amendment.

Mr. BYRNS. The gentleman speaks of the Treasury Department passing upon these claims. The gentleman, of course, is aware of the fact that in all these cases they are really acted upon by one of the employees of the Treasury Department.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Allow me to answer that. I do not think there is a Member of this House who has not had experience with the Income Tax Bureau or division, and I think every one of us knows this: That each return passes through several hands, and very often it passes through a court of appeals right in the Treasury Department; I have never found a case myself where I acted for a constituent when I did not meet at least three men who have examined the facts, and who understand the facts, and who have been intelligent and active and zealous in the performance of their duties.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. DEMPSEY. May I have three additional minutes?

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. O'CONNOR of Louisiana. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEMPSEY. Certainly.

Mr. O'CONNOR of Louisiana. The gentleman from New York is justly proud of the power and prestige and influence of the House of Representatives. May I ask the gentleman if that prestige is involved in any way in the failure thus far of his endeavor to obtain consideration of a river and harbor bill at the present session?

Mr. DEMPSEY. I will answer that at a later time.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. DEMPSEY. Yes; I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. CRAMTON. The gentleman just had a question from the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER], which would seem to indicate that the gentleman from Texas recognizes the injustice of our denying the payment of claims above a certain fixed amount, and suggests that we might bar payment until the claims are examined by his committee. But those claims are so numerous and so complicated that unless we set up under that joint committee an organization almost duplicating the force of the Internal Revenue Bureau, that committee could not reach the point where they would feel justified in approving those claims.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Yes. Not only that, but I recognize that, taking into consideration an individual claim, such as the Steel Trust claim, might require years of examination. The gentleman from Texas said four methods were adopted for the consideration of these claims, and that with three of them he was satisfied, and the fourth he severely criticized.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. No. "The gentleman from Texas" said the adoption of any one of the three would have been satisfactory, and would have saved the Government many millions of dollars.

Mr. DEMPSEY. I will take the gentleman's present statement. All that the gentleman criticised in his speech on Saturday was the fact that the corporation was heard. Have we reached the point where a taxpayer is not entitled to be heard? Even in a criminal case the criminal in the dock has the right to be heard. And yet the gentleman from Texas criticises this severely, and says that that is a thing which he characterizes as improper and reprehensible.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has again expired.

Mr. DEMPSEY. May I have three additional minutes?

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. DEMPSEY. The gentleman from Texas makes the complaint that that is really a reprehensible thing—the fact that these corporations were heard.

Why, gentlemen, how is the case to be presented at all? How are you to have anything except to go back to the star-chamber proceedings of hundreds of years ago, which Anglo-Saxon progress and energy and love of liberty have banished for all time? How are you to have anything except that unless you give the attorneys for these corporations the right to be heard, and that, I take it, as we all listened Saturday, was the chief subject of criticism on the part of the gentleman from Texas.

In closing, gentlemen, permit me to say this: That I will put in as a part of my speech the income taxes collected in this country since the income tax law came into force, the tax refunds during that period, the total taxes paid during that period, and the amount of back taxes collected. You will find on examining them that they constitute a glorious and splendid record. You will find that they redound to the credit of Andrew Mellon and of David H. Blair. You will find that you will be glad to follow these men who have done so marvelously well throughout all of the period since 1920. [Applause.] The matter referred to is as follows:

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has again expired.

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Chairman, I want the attention of the committee for a very few minutes, in order that you may know exactly the question before the committee and what it means. On last Saturday we were informed that an amendment would be offered under the 5-minute rule to strike out this item entirely. All of the debate upon that day was based upon the assumption that that character of motion would be made here to-day, but gentlemen upon the other side, upon reflection and after timely consideration, have concluded that they do not want to take that responsibility, and no one should want to take it. They have lessened in some little degree their attitude, but what does their present proposal mean and what is it? It is proposed now that no sum in excess of $75,000 shall be paid out of this appropriation. The major portion, as I am informed, of this appropriation will be used to pay claims in excess of $75,000. Now, what will happen if this amendment prevails? It means that no payments shall be made where a claim is $75,000 or more, so that most of this appropriation will not be used and those entitled to refunds will not get what they are entitled to.

I wish to call attention to this fact, that if this amendment is adopted there will be no use for this joint committee and this expert, for even if this expert, under the law creating that official and this committee, were to make an investigation and were to find in favor of a payment or against it, their report would amount to nothing. If they determined in favor of a payment it could not be made if this amendment is to prevail, so that we are in this ridiculous position: We have a law giving authority to the Treasury Department of the United States to make these refunds, and yet this body is saying to the Treasury Department of the United States, which has been making these refunds under established law and regulations since the beginning of this income tax law, that no payment shall be made in excess of $75,000.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD. What is going to happen? These claims are being passed upon at the rate of 14,000 a month or 170,000 a year. This Congress is going to adjourn very shortly, and unless some new law is enacted to supplant that law the fear that has been expressed by the gentleman from Texas, now on his feet, time and time again, will become a reality and the whole system will break down. I now yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. So far as excess-profits taxes are concerned, the testimony is that there are only 12,000 cases still pending, and if they are passing on them at the rate of 14,000 a month, they would be through with them in 30 days.

[1] Exact figures not available for the years 1921, 1922, 1923, and 1924. No figures available for years prior to 1921.

Mr. WOOD. The gentleman knows that if they pass on them at the rate of 170,000 a year, with the cases now pending, it will take three years to become current. The gentleman from Texas was insistent upon our increasing the number of the judges upon the Board of Tax Appeals in order that we might have the work made current, and we did that, more largely at his behest than at the behest of anyone else. Now, for the purpose of preventing payment, he is not only going to add to the burden of these agencies that are now overburdened but he is going to destroy the very machinery that makes it possible to have these tax refunds made. So we are presenting a most ridiculous picture to the American public. We are acknowledging that we have millions of dollars that have been erroneously taken from the pockets of the taxpayers of this country and yet we are now like children proposing that we are not going to pay the money back if a claim exceeds $75,000. What inconsistency! What a travesty it is!

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I ask the attention of the Members for just a few moments in order that I may explain my attitude upon the pending amendment.

If the amendment first proposed by my colleague from Tennessee had not fallen before a point of order, I should have given it my support, because it would have added at least an additional safeguard on this question of refund, and the matter which seems to worry the gentleman from New York [Mr. DEMPSEY] as to the House surrendering some prerogative that belongs to it would not, in my opinion, have been in the way at all, or at least not to an extent that would have prevented my supporting that amendment.

But, Mr. Chairman, when it comes to this amendment, I find myself driven to the conclusion that I ought not to support it.

The refund settlements that are involved and provided for in this $75,000,000 have been made under the processes of law as that law existed. There is no proposal involved in the amendment now offered by my colleague providing for a change of the law. It could not be because it would have fallen before a point of order, just as his other amendment did. So we find ourselves in the parliamentary situation where we are thrown up against the naked proposition of whether we will vote to make the refunds that have been established under the processes of law that have been in progress through all these years or whether we will hold them up where they are in excess of $75,000.

Mr. BYRNS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. BYRNS. Does not the gentleman know, as a matter of fact, that if this amendment is adopted the Congress is not going to refuse to appropriate money for the payment of these settlements, and that we will then have a way by which you and I and other Members of this Congress can vote intelligently and not vote $75,000,000 or any other sum out of the Terasury without the slightest information upon the part of the gentleman or myself or any other Member as to whether we are doing the right thing or not.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Well, all that I know about it is that these refunds have been made under the processes of law that have been in existence through all these years, just as other refunds have been made in the past.

I sympathize with the attitude taken by my colleague from Texas [Mr. GARNER]. I appreciate the force of the criticisms made by him in his addresses upon the subject. I stand ready to vote for any additional safeguards of law that it is possible to have, but when it comes to the naked amount of appropriations made simply to carry out law that has been in existence here all these years, I find myself greatly disturbed at being invited to vote against the refunds, and do not see how I can do it.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I regret exceedingly that our leader has found himself unable to support this amendment. I was under the impression it had his sympathy and would have his support. It might have been because I was under the impression that the limitations that were first offered in the amendment were in order.

I want to call the attention of the gentleman from Tennessee to the fact that as a minority party seeking to remedy a condition that seems to me demonstrates bad administration of this law, we have no remedy except the one this amendment may possibly bring about. If we had a remedy, if a bill was before the House at this time, where we could have an opportunity to place on the statute books such remedies as the gentleman speaks of or those that might occur to our minds, I would join the gentleman most heartily, and I admit that this is an indirect effort to accomplish what you and I would like to accomplish. This is the only opportunity, I repeat, and unless we avail ourselves of it, then these conditions which have been discovered by the joint committee will continue to exist in the Treasury Department, so far as we know, for all time to come.

Turn to page 1219 of the RECORD, if you desire, and look at the case that I briefly called your attention to on last Saturday, known as the "X" tobacco case, which is the Reynolds Tobacco Co. You will find that the Treasury Department gave the Reynolds Tobacco Co. $9,200,000, not $7,628,000, as reported to the joint committee, because they had already given them prior to that time $1,600,000.

No court can reach that case. No remedy is at hand except to withhold the money and let this committee look into it. This committee, through its agent, did criticize that settlement.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Is that involved in this appropriation?

Mr. GARNER of Texas. No, sir; not in this appropriation; but similar cases are involved.

The testimony shows the United States Steel Corporation will be settled within this fiscal year if they are paid to-day on the same basis that they have been settled with, and that they will pay them in the neighborhood of $28,000,000 additional, including $13,000,000 interest. That is the testimony from the Treasury Department. And not only testified to before the committee, but testified to before the joint committee. This case of the United States Steel Corporation is being settled for the 1917 taxes only, and Mr. Bond says, "If you approve this, or if we settle with them on this basis, I hope to settle with them; and I believe I can settle with them for the 1918, 1919, and 1920 taxes on the same basis"; and that will involve giving them $28,000,000 additional.

This may be a harsh remedy temporarily, but this does not mean that we are not going to pay these people every dollar that we owe them. There is not a man in this House who would refuse to return to the taxpayer every dollar that he paid into the Treasury that the law did not require him to pay; but I do say, in view of the facts that we have deduced here by a small investigation of the joint committee, that we ought to have an opportunity now to go into the merits of some of these.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have 10 additional minutes.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Oh, I do not think I want them. I occupied the floor on Saturday, and tried to explain at that time as far as I could. I shall ask for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Mr. Chairman, no one wants to refuse to pay whatever is just in a refund of taxes erroneously paid, but are you afraid to have your joint committee make an investigation of those claims in excess of $75,000? There is a reason for that. Congress authorized and directed this joint committee to make an investigation of everything in excess of $75,000. It makes the investigation. It criticizes and protests the payment, but the Treasury continues to make the payment.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Yes.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. Would the interest run on?

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Certainly.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. How much would the interest be?

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Oh, I have heard a good deal about that interest question. It is very alarming to the gentleman from Iowa and every other man who stands in his position, who are hunting an excuse to do what the Treasury wants, and then do it. We are paying 4¼ per cent interest now on the last borrowings of the Secretary of the Treasury, the greatest one since Alexander Hamilton, who has refunded every debt at a less rate of interest than a Democrat did. He is paying 4¼ now on several hundred million dollars that he borrowed the last time. That is only 1¾ per cent interest difference, so do not bother too much about the interest. You are paying 4¼ now for this money that you give to the taxpayer.

No one wants to refuse to pay this obligation of the Government, but all we ask is an opportunity to look into it and see if the refund has merit. Do not you want to do that? Is there a taxpayer having an application for refund at the present time which amounts to over a billion dollars who will object to the joint committee of the House or its experts examining to see whether the Treasury Department has allowed them their correct amount of refunds? As I said the other day, the Secretary of the Treasury ought to welcome it. The joint committee has criticized a number of them. The joint committee has suggested different methods upon which to ascertain the facts and has criticized the total amount to be returned. But you gentlemen are not willing to postpone for 60 days or 90 days or 6 months, for that matter, the payment of these refunds in excess of $75,000 in order to give the joint committee an opportunity to function, in order to give this joint committee an opportunity to do what the law intended it to do, and, Mr. GARRETT, this is the only way that we can force it to be done. There is no other way that I know of by which you can compel this joint committee to act; when we get the eyes of the country focused upon it we will get results. With this amendment you will have it acting, and you will have it approving or disapproving and you will have some information by which Mr. ANTHONY and the other members of the committee can arrive at some intelligent conclusion as to how much they ought to appropriate for refunds and know of the merits of those refunds, which will be included in that lump-sum appropriation.

Mr. LOZIER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Yes.

Mr. LOZIER. In view of the fact that our Government is built around Congress, is it not a matter of the highest ethics and duty of Congress to find out from its own experts if necessary and possible whether or not these expenditures are just?

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Oh, yes. When I saw my friend from New York [Mr. DEMPSEY] get up the other day, come down from New York and take an active interest in this case, I said, "There is the greatest defender the Republican Party has, and there must be something dead up creek." [Laughter.] Whenever you see that gentleman coming in here you may know that the old G. O. P. is in trouble and they have sent for him. I think gentlemen understand this amendment, and I am willing to have it voted on now.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, the pending amendment simply proposes that if a claim is above a certain amount we shall not appropriate for its payment. There is no method proposed that would define any more clearly our liability than the present law. None even has been suggested that would in any way improve the situation. The amendment would even go so far as to prevent the payment of judgments above $75,000 rendered against collectors which would carry interest.

I have been interested in getting the division of sentiment in the minority party in the House on this question. We have heard on one side of the question from the leader of the minority, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT], and we have heard indirect opposition from the presumptive heir-apparent to the leadership of the minority, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER].

We have not yet heard from the new party whip, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BOX]. We only get his views on party policies through the public press and on other subjects. There is one thing I would like to know, and I believe the minority would like to know. They were polled in the presidential election on a certain question in a great attempt to whip them into one coherent mass. I would be glad to know, in view of the assurances given the country by the present chairman of the Democratic National Committee, Mr. Raskob, that that party is not opposed to big business; that big business has nothing to fear from the Democratic Party—as I say, I am interested to know what he thinks of this attempt to have Congress declare big business can not expect to receive consideration at the hands of Congress; that if they have a claim above $75,000 Congress will make no appropriation——

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. I will try to find out by to-morrow, if the gentleman can wait that long.

Mr. CRAMTON. I think it would be interesting to know.

The CHAIRMAN. All time has expired——

Mr. CRAMTON. I am glad to know there is one gentleman of the Democratic minority who thinks he is close enough to the Democratic National Committee chairman to be able to find out anything from him. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. All time has expired. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee.

The question was taken; and there were—ayes 105, nays 112.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Supreme Court Building: For acquisition of a site for a building for the Supreme Court, in addition to the appropriation heretofore made, $268,741.

Mr. NEWTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I would like the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations. The Inland Waterways Corporation is an agency of the Government in the War Department, and, generally speaking, I think its appropriations come under the War Department appropriations bill. I notice that there is no provision in the urgent deficiency bill for an appropriation for the Inland Waterways Corporation. Last May, after very extended hearings, the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce reported out a bill increasing the capital stock from $5,000,000 to $15,000,000. Now the basic law reads that that corporation was formed and the capital was furnished for the purpose of carrying out the "mandate" and the "purpose" of Congress as set forth in the transportation act and in the Inland Waterways Corporation act. Now, that was last May. In the meantime some six or seven months have elapsed, ample time, it would appear, for the gathering of the necessary information together for the purpose of submitting an estimate. Now, can the distinguished chairman of this committee say just what is the situation in reference to that new authorization, which is more than an authorization because it is to carry out a mandate of Congress in reference to carrying on our inland-waterways development?

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman from Minnesota very accurately sets forth the situation in regard to the inland waterways item. The committee took up the matter with the Bureau of the Budget. It was my desire that the appropriation which that act directed should be carried in this bill, but the Bureau of the Budget advised us it was desired to make further inquiries into the requirements before submitting the estimate for an appropriation; that, furthermore, General Ashburn was out of town while we were writing up this bill, and they desired first to confer with him, but it was their intention to bring up the item for the next deficiency bill. And I find they wanted to make further inquiries in order to get the exact cost involved in the securing of power and barges, and I understand they are mostly for the Mississippi and Missouri, and they felt that instead of appropriating the full $5,000,000, that has been spoken of for this purpose, they would only ask for the exact amount to purchase the equipment needed.

Mr. NEWTON. If this goes over to the general deficiency bill, that will not become a law, of course, until the extreme end of the session; that is, if we may use our knowledge of the past in judging of the future. That will mean a delay of two months in the letting of a contract for the building of the barges and the making of the towboats that are necessary. Now, a delay of two months means the difference between having this additional equipment to carry grain from my section of the country and from the gentleman's section of the country and not having it. That is my affair; and the thought I have is surely if there is anything that should be included in an urgent deficiency bill it is a deficiency appropriation for that capital stock which Congress mandated last May.

Mr. ANTHONY. I think the gentleman very accurately represents the situation.

Furthermore, I may say that the Chief of Engineers promised that the new channel of the Missouri River from Kansas City to St. Louis would be ready for navigation in 1930, and I know that the business and shipping interests at Kansas City and all along that river are very anxious that the equipment, the towboats and barges for navigation, be provided for without any delay in the program.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have three minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. NEWTON. I sincerely doubt whether the equipment will be ready in time to move the grain crop.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NEWTON. Yes.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Would the gentleman object to our making at least a part of this appropriation available on the passage of the general deficiency bill?

Mr. ANTHONY. Inasmuch as the committee lacked accurate figures, and the Bureau of the Budget promised accurate figures, it was necessary for us to delay.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. It might be sufficient to meet the objection of the gentleman from Minnesota if we were to provide that of any such an amount as Congress would appove in the next deficiency bill a certain amount of that would become immediately available.

Mr. ANTHONY. The gentleman knows that the entire sum would be available if any lump sum were put on the general deficiency bill.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NEWTON. Yes.

Mr. DYER. Is the gentleman able to advise the House at this time if it has received from General Lord a general recommendation?

Mr. ANTHONY. As I understand, General Lord is awaiting the arrival of General Ashburn in Washington. When he receives the accurate figures we will undoubtedly get an estimate up here.

Mr. DYER. The amount authorized is $10,000,000.

Mr. NEWTON. Yes; $10,000,000.

Mr. DYER. Is it a fact, or does the gentleman know, that General Lord has sent in a recommendation of a total amount of $3,000,000?

Mr. ANTHONY. I have no official information on that, but my guess is that it is believed that the equipment and power can be purchased for from three and one-half to four millions.

Mr. NEWTON. That is to meet the immediate necessity?

Mr. ANTHONY. That is the idea. Congress, of course, does not want to appropriate more money for a given purpose than is absolutely necessary.

Mr. NEWTON. We passed this law in May last. We passed it after very thorough hearings. I think our committee worked upon it for two or three weeks, possibly longer than that. There was no question about the need and necessity of additional equipment for the Warrior River, for the lower Mississippi, and for the upper Mississippi River, and the lower Missouri when that was completed; and then the Illinois River. Of course, the equipment needed on the Missouri River need not be provided in the present calendar year, but it will be needed shortly after that. The money for the equipment to be used on the Illinois River need not be expended until that channel is completed, probably not before two years. But the great bulk of that sum should be made available during the present year.

Now as to this question of additional time in which to consider the question. This was the mandate of Congress. General Ashburn was certainly in the city, and General Lord was in the city during the past seven months. They must have known that there would be a deficiency bill. I am somewhat surprised myself that this matter has been allowed to go on without inquiry into the details until the Christmas holidays. I do not know whether the committee has given consideration to it or not, but it seems to me that when Congress writes a law in the nature of a mandate the estimates ought to come down somewhere near the amount of authorization, and come down as expeditiously as possible. There has been ample time in which to find out just what is needed, the cost, and all of that; and the delay, unless something can be done, is going to mean that the farmers of my section of the country and the gentleman's section of the country who have had their grain held at St. Louis, the neck of the bottle, where there was not enough equipment to send it down, will continue to be at a disadvantage. That is going to be the situation in the coming year. From August of 1928 we on the upper river were filled to capacity until close of navigation.

We could have handled much greater tonnage if we had had the capacity. This was likewise true of the lower river. The farmer does not get the maximum benefit of lower rates and will not until we have barge and towboat equipment which is reasonably adequate to meet the demand; otherwise, buyers of grain can not figure on cheap water rates.

Mr. Chairman, under the authorization by Congress of this legislation we ought to speedily make the necessary appropriation, and it should be in amount in keeping with the authorization. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has again expired. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

INDEPENDENT OFFICES

For salaries and expenses, office of Alien Property Custodian, $61.81.
For salaries and expenses, Board of Tax Appeals, $4.
For contingent expenses, Civil Service Commission, $30.25.
For expenses, Commission of Fine Arts, $1.93.
For housing for war needs, $2,939.03.

Mr. KELLY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. KELLY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask the chairman of the committee in charge of the bill a question regarding the item for housing for war needs, on line 19 of page 18. Is that a claim for the United States Housing Corporation, as administered by the Department of Labor?

Mr. ANTHONY. I am advised these are claims dating back to 1918 and 1919 of the old Housing Corporation which have just been settled and approved.

Mr. KELLY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to take this opportunity of stating—calling attention to the fact—that this will probably be the last time we shall deal with governmental housing activities of the war period. Congress appropriated $100,000,000 during the war for housing construction for civilian needs. This work was turned over to the Department of Labor and that department after the armistice proceeded to dispose of the projects. I am informed there will be returned to the Treasury 75 per cent of the entire expenditure, which is probably the greatest return from any expenditure of the kind made by the Government during the war. It is an indication of the fact that while we often fail to appreciate it, the Department of Labor deals with most important and difficult problems. The present Secretary, James J. Davis, has made an enviable record in dealing with these questions efficiently and successfully.

Mr. Chairman, it is no easy task. Capital and labor seem at times to be engaged in an irrepressible and unending conflict. The Department of Labor must stand between them and strive to help both while injuring neither.

Immigration restrictionists and opponents of restriction come to grips in this department which is charged with the responsibility of enforcing immigration laws. It requires the wisdom of a Solomon to act justly in all the multitude of cases which are appealed to the Secretary.

Through eight years Secretary Davis has efficiently and successfully met the tests of his office. Broad-minded, humane, and just, he has forced conflicting interests to recognize that common understanding will do much to lessen the area of conflict.

A toiler himself, his sympathies are with the men who earn their bread in the sweat of their brows. Time and again, just when it was needed, he warned that wage cuts spelled disaster, not alone to the workers but to capital as well. He pointed out that the employer who pays good wages enables his men to buy the products of industry and live up to the American standard.

Yet he has always pointed out that our continued prosperity depends upon efficient production. Increase the products and there will be more to divide. In season and out, Secretary Davis has preached sound doctrine for the development of this Nation and its people. He has earned the gratitude of all good Americans.

Mr. Chairman, few persons realize how far flung are the activities of the Department of Labor. No country in the world is outside the scope of the quota immigration acts which have been enacted by Congress since Secretary Davis took office in 1921.

Amendment of the original act was necessary, and great assistance was given by Secretary Davis in framing the act of 1924. In spite of all criticism, no sane man can deny that the policy adopted has had a tremendous effect upon the prosperity of this country.

The examination of prospective immigrants prior to embarkation for this country was a problem which presented many difficulties, but it has been worked out with patience and tact and firmness and is operating successfully.

A border patrol has been organized to prevent the surreptitious entry of aliens. Those who enter illegally are dealt with by another organized division and deportations number a thousand each month.

The naturalization service has been speeded up. Where before there was delay of months and sometimes years in furnishing certificates of arrival for aliens' petitions for citizenship, this work is now up to date. At the same time, the safeguards of proper citizenship have been increased.

The Bureau of Labor Statistics is doing better work than ever before and on a wider scale. Within the limit of appropriations it is furnishing vitally important information. It has made studies of the productivity of labor and the effects of the mechanization of industry. It has studied industrial accidents and occupational diseases and given the facts to those concerned. It has studied workmen's compensation laws and given to State and Federal Governments the facts upon which to base action.

The experience of Secretary Davis has made possible the direction of these fact-finding inquiries in the manner most valuable to workers and employers.

The conciliation service has been largely molded by the Secretary because of his intense interest in its purpose. Since 1921 there have been more than 4,000 instances in which the offices of the Secretary of Labor and Director of Conciliation have been used in industrial disputes, involving strikes, lockouts, and threatened strikes and lockouts. These cases concern more than 4,000,000 workers and involved practically every line of industry, including the packing industry, marine workers, coal miners, textiles, building trades, and many others.

The Secretary of Labor has earnestly proclaimed the truth that reason must prevail and that disputes should be settled around a council table before a strike rather than after it. The fact that there is to-day less conflict between workers and employers than at any time in our industrial history shows the progress made.

The employment service has been organized to give every particle of benefit possible. Secretary Davis acts upon the belief that the greatest need in America is a steady job with full and fair compensation for every man willing to work. He has devoted special attention to the problem of the man over 50 years of age who has been displaced because of machinery. His messages and advice to industrial leaders have helped to compel recognition of this serious problem.

Mr. Chairman, I believe in giving credit where credit is due. Serving in the Cabinets of two Presidents, Secretary James J. Davis has written a record of faithful, devoted efforts for the advancement of the general welfare. An outstanding Pennsylvanian, his achievements have made and will continue to make a better America. [Applause.]

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

The Clerk concluded the reading of the bill.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. LEHLBACH, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 15848) making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in certain appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929, and prior fiscal years, to provide urgent supplemental appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929, and for other purposes, had directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and amendments to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them engross. The question is on agreeing to the amendments.

The amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I offer a motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee offers a motion to recommit which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. BYRNS moves to recommit the bill to the Committee on Appropriations, with instructions to report back forthwith with the following amendment:

After the word "each" in line 12, page 12, strike out the period, insert a colon, and add the following: "Provided, That no part of the appropriation herein made shall be available for paying any tax refund in excess of $75,000."

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the motion to recommit.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee to recommit the bill with instructions.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 130, nays 169, not voting 138, as follows:

THE CASE OF J. L. LYONS & CO.

Mr. O'CONNOR of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on a bill which I have introduced for the relief of I. L. Lyons.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Louisiana?

There was no objection.

Mr. O'CONNOR of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, W. R. Hearst offers a prize of $25,000 for the best plan to repeal the eighteenth amendment. Some day we shall know who won the prize and what his plan is. W. C. Durant offered a prize of $25,000 for the best plan to make the eighteenth amendment effective. The Durant award has been made to Maj. Chester P. Mills. No one who has the slightest knowledge of the subject believes that the Mills plan will reduce the quantity of liquor that is being daily consumed throughout the country.

As a matter of fact, many of the prominent prohibition officials profess to see nothing new in the plan and are disposed to cynically dismiss it as "old stuff." The problem that confronts the Prohibition Bureau, and apparently one that is not susceptible to a definite and permanent solution, is how to prevent men and women, urbanite and ruralite, from making liquors, whisky, wine, and beer, when and as long as great mature continues to furnish the fundamentals and practice, habit of action, and repetition makes for proficiency in the details that change corn and rye into whisky, grapes into wine, and malt and hops into beer.

In three or four years a man or woman may become a good cook or baker, or both, and as chef prepare and furnish roasts and pastries to Sybarites of such excellency as to secure him great fame among the followers and votaries of Epicurus. Doubtlessly there are thousands, male and female, in the cities great and small whose merit in the way of making palatable and appealing whiskies and wines is extolled as an accomplishment devoutly to be wished; and it would be interesting to know how many agriculturists who have not by dint of several years' experience arrived at that period of development when they look upon their products as equal in kick, color, and purity to the choice liquors of the days that are no more, which disappeared in gloom when the Volstead Act found anchorage in Congress. There are many good citizens who do not believe it came as good tidings of a great joy. They view it as a Pandora's box opened wide with not much hope left behind to console the apprehensive.

There is one influence which will tend to check the rising tide or flood of liquor made in homes both in the cities and country, and that influence will be claimed as the result of his efforts by the professional prohibitionist. The public opinion that so rapidly crystallized all over the country against the open and public traffic in intoxicants, supported by leading industrialists, transportation executives, public-utilities officials, and merchants great and small, was due in a large measure to the extraordinary development and expansion that our country was undergoing in every conceivable line of its activities. For some inexplicable reason that crystallization apparently was paralyzed with the advent of the eighteenth amendment.

Some good people say that as long as the movement depended for its advance upon its own merit and what appeared to many as a moral appeal it was an irresistible force, but as soon as it was merged into a legislative enactment supported by the club, the sneak, the witch burner, the fanatical lyncher, jails, and penitentiaries, it lost the vitalizing force of its genesis and sank to the level of an irritating statute that ought to be linked up with blue laws and those infamous statutes that doomed unfortunates for their religious belief. But there may be a galvanization. A generation that has done so much for the advancement of civilization on land, sea, in the air, in every walk, alley, street, and avenue of life must have been building up a defense system against this flood of booze, and prevented that inundation which otherwise would have long since driven us to rafts.

This brings us to the question, Will the country be better off in the course of the years without distilleries, wineries, and breweries turning out a superior output as a result of first-class machinery appurtenances operated by trained operators and supervised by chemists and food experts, and which could be so regulated and licensed as to make for a reduction in the consumption of intoxicants, while yielding an enormous reveenue presently enjoyed by bootleggers, rum runners, and grafters all over the United States, though the Nation be exposed to the danger of having millions make what they might buy if they had a legal right to do so? Every observant man knows that there are as many or more soft-drink establishments, as many, if not more speakeasies to-day than there were open undisguised barrooms before the Volstead Act became the law which is more honored in the breach than the observance. Every man who has eyes to see and ears to hear knows that there are as many arrests, if not more, to-day than 10 years ago. Every man who reads the newspapers knows that there are more deaths from poisonous stuff sold by bootleggers than ever before. But things can not get any better until they get a little worse.

When the day does arrive that will bring home to us the truth that it is far better to discover with the eyes of statesmanship the ineradicable tendencies of millions in every generation and to regulate wisely those tendencies than to attempt to prohibit them, we shall have taken a forward step, one in the right direction. Then we may have a resubmission of the Rhode Island case—for its underlying constitutional principle still clamors for recognition. And if public opinion be strong enough may see the eighteenth amendment, which is becoming a menace to every other article of the great covenant, swept aside in order that way should be made for safe, sound, and sane legislation that will promote the cause of temperance, instead of conditions that now obtain, and their implications, present and future, by no means reassuring to many of our countrymen.

Of course there are numbers of lawyers who believe that the eighteenth amendment is not an inhibition upon the Government going into the liquor business by way of dispensaries or otherwise. But not many believe that the Government is already in that business and not conducting or operating its business in accordance with the ethics and standards of the commercial morality that should prevail. Let the following legal document unfold its own tale, from which the cynic may draw sardonic humor and the champion of Volstead law enforcement some information and wisdom. And I pray the latter to remember that the world was not submerged with immorality prior to the eighteenth amendment. Nor was the tea-drinking Orient superior to the temperate Occident.

In the United States District Court for the Eastern District of Louisiana, New Orleans Division

I. L. Lyons & Co. (Ltd.) v. United States of America, No. —

To the honorables the judges of the United States District Court in and for the Eastern District of Louisiana, New Orleans Division:

The petition of I. L. Lyons & Co. (Ltd), a corporation organized under the laws of the State of Louisiana and domiciled and doing business in the city of New Orleans; represents:

That petitioner is, among other things, engaged in the business of selling drugs at wholesale, and, as a wholesale dealer in drugs, it has a permit to purchase and sell intoxicating liquors;

That, by an order entered by this honorable court, the United States marshal for the eastern district of Louisiana, and the United States Customs Service, collection district No. 20, port of New Orleans, were authorized to sell to such persons possessing permits to purchase, certain intoxicating liquors then in the possession of the said United States marshal and the said United States Customs Service;

That in accordance with said authorization petitioner, among others, was solicited to purchase the said liquors by the said United States marshal and a Mr. Gordon, storekeeper in the United States Customs Service, and at the time of said solicitation said liquors were represented by the United States marshal and the said Mr. Gordon of the United States Customs Service to be genuine and fit for resale by petitioner for medicinal purposes in the course of its business as a wholesaler of drugs;

Petitioner avers that by reason of said representations, it purchased from the United States marshal and the said United States Customs Service, liquors of the kind and for the prices and on the dates set forth in the invoices of said sales;

Petitioner further represents that of said liquors so purchased it has on hand 269 gallons of Old Lewis Hunter rye whisky; 548.25 gallons of Atherton whisky; 220 gallons of Old Boone whisky; 233.25 gallons of Cedar Brook whisky; and 123.60 gallons of Scotch whisky, or a total of 1,395.35 gallons of whisky; 523.90 gallons of wine; and 20¾ gallons of assorted liquors;

Petitioner avers that of said gallons of whisky on hand (other than Scotch whisky), approximately one-half thereof was purchased from the United States Customs Service and approximately one-half thereof was purchased from the United States marshal;

Petitioner further represents that the average price of said gallons of whisky paid to the United States marshal and the United States Customs Service for said whiskies was the sum of $658.93 for 233.25 gallons of Cedar Brook whisky; the sum of $807 for 269 gallons of Old Lewis Hunter rye whisky; the sum of $1,644.75 for 548.25 gallons of Atherton whisky; and the sum of $715 for 220 gallons of Old Boone whisky, or a total of $3,825.68;

That of said Scotch whisky on hand, 30 gallons were purchased from the United States marshal for the sum of $60, and 93.61 gallons were purchased from the United States Customs Service for the sum of $327.60, or a total sum of $387.60;

That the 523.90 gallons of wine were purchased for the price of $0.90 per gallon, or the sum of $471.51, and the 20¾ gallons of assorted liquors for the sum of $3.50 per gallon, or a total of $72.63;

That in a letter to the Treasury Department, Bureau of Investigation, under date of September 28, 1927, I. L. Lyons & Co. addressed a communication to the Treasury Department, Bureau of Prohibition, for the purpose of obtaining the necessary permit to effect a sale of the liquors purchased as Old Lewis Hunter rye whisky, to the Frankfort Distillery for rebottling for medicinal distribution, and that in reply to said letter I. L. Lyons & Co. received from the Treasury Department, Bureau of Prohibition, a communication under date of October 6, 1927, in which said communication I. L. Lyon & Co. was advised that from an investigation conducted by the office of the prohibition administrator at New Orleans, the spirits were low in proof and of doubtful character, and that the bottles bore spurious labels and imitation strip stamps; and further, that there was no basis for a belief that the spirits were of the origin and production claimed or that there was any indication that they ever had a legal status prior to their seizure, and that accordingly such spirits could not be bottled in bond and strip stamps affixed thereto, nor could they be sold as bottled-in-bond spirits for medicinal use;

Petitioner further avers that the whiskies, wines, and liquors purchased by it were purchased in the utmost good faith and in complete reliance upon the representations of the said United States marshal and the employees of the United States Customs Service to the effect that said spirits were genuine and could be resold by it for medicinal purposes in its course of business as a wholesaler of drugs;

That since the results of the investigation of the Treasury Department into the character of whisky purchased by it from the United States marshal and from the United States Customs Service, it has reason to doubt the genuineness of all of said whiskies, wines, and liquors purchased by it from the United States marshal and the United States Customs Service, and because of this doubt it alleges upon information and belief that all of said whiskies, wines, and liquors are not genuine and are not fit for resale by it as a wholesaler for medicinal purposes; accordingly that the sales of said whiskies, wines, and liquors to it by the United States marshal and the United States Customs Service should be rescinded and that it should recover from respondent the purchase price of said whiskies, wines, and liquors, which petitioner avers to be the sum of $4,757.39.

I have given enough of the petition to anyone of imagination to lead him in fancy over the Spanish Main and the many adventures that this captured and confiscated booze must have, like many inanimate things, experienced. And what a dismal, sordid, and unromantic end—its virtues once praised by the Government which has turned upon it with epithet and denied it place to legally end its existence via medicinal channels.

I have introduced a bill for the relief of I. L. Lyons & Co. and hope it will soon be passed by the Congress in order that the escutcheon of the country may rest unblemished in its booze transactions, as the court does not apparently see how it can cut the legal Gordian knot.

ADDRESS OF HON. HARRY B. HAWES, OF MISSOURI

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting a speech recently delivered by Senator HAWES on the life and character of Hon. David R. Francis, former Secretary of the Interior, former Governor of Missouri, and former United States Ambassador to Russia.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, St. Louis lost one of its leading citizens when Hon. David Rowland Francis passed away. He had held many positions of public trust—mayor of his city, governor of his State, Secretary of the Interior during the administration of President Cleveland, and ambassador to Russia, appointed by the late President Wilson.

He was president of the Louisiana Purchase Exposition Co., under whose auspices was held the Universal Exposition of 1904 in St. Louis.

Under leave to print, I include a memorial address delivered by Hon. HARRY B. HAWES, United States Senator from Missouri, before the Missouri Historical Society, on the life and character of Governor Francis.

The address follows:

DAVID ROWLAND FRANCIS

Let us visualize David Rowland Francis as he was before suffering from the blighting hand of foreign service.

There was never a finer picture of a real male man. No mollycoddle here, no sentimental theorist, no poser, no sycophant, no straddler, no hypocrite. He was a big man who had big conceptions, surrounded himself with big men and did big things. He had the vision for large things. He went to his objectives in a masterful way, sometimes with impatience, sometimes pushing aside without deference the obstacles that stood in his way. His designs were good and he gained his goal in straightforward combat.

Governor Francis enjoyed a cigar, a horse, a drink; delighted in a bright eye, a pretty face; responded to a good song, a good story, and a good friend. He served his friends, he served his city, he served his State, he served his Nation with both ability and distinction. There is no taint or blemish upon his escutcheon. There is no ugly whisper or scandal left to scar his memory. He hit hard and took some good blows in return; and then reached out to help, to succor, to bind up wounds, to soften things and make life not only more pleasant but more honorable. He carried with him into adventures of great magnitude the heart of a boy. He saw the humorous, joyful things of life, and while demanding his full share he was quick to divide his pleasures with others.

David Francis was a fighter when as a boy he crawled on a coach and sold papers during the war in a small Kentucky town. He was a fighter when in the closing years of his life he faced a mob in a foreign city and, with pistol in hand, defended the ancient "right of castle."

Can't you see him now as on hospital Saturday, with some chosen friends, he visits the booths in the hotels and office buildings, covered with badges, smiling, joking, the picture of health, good spirits, and the very embodiment of good fellowship, the leader, the inspiration of our most popular charity? How many will remember the old days at the Den in the Merchants Exchange, during the Veiled Prophet's Ball, when he led in the queen and, in his inimitable way, made another queen of each maid and each matron?

How he spread sunshine and good fellowship! He knew by first name more men than any other man in the city, and more men knew him and called him "Dave." The "Dave" was not a familiarity; it was esteem, regard, and affection. When the ball game was opened he was there; when a school was dedicated he spoke; when a park was opened he presided; when a new union station was needed he led the way; when a bridge was required he made the plan. He built the very hall in which we are assembled to-night.

In affairs of a city, as in the life of an individual, there comes a time when a forward step must be taken, or the ground already gained will be lost. This period came when the people made Rolla Wells mayor, and with that came the inspiration for the World's Fair and the inspiration and organization came from David Francis.

I will not detain you with an extended discussion of that event. Suffice to say he invited the Nation and the Nation came; he invited the world and the world came. They came from the farms and they came from the small towns, and they came from the factories and from the colleges of learning. They visited our city and they liked it. They found it was a city of homes, of generous impulse, of fine old traditions; a place good to live in, to grow up in, and in which to be buried. They came from the four quarters of the Nation to the heart of the Nation. They saw the possibilities of trade and commerce. The forward stride which we took then was necessary. It was not a mere plan of advertising, it was an awakening of the spirit of the city to do better things. It kept St. Louis moving forward when she might have stood still. Our progress to-day may be attributed largely to the inspiration of Francis and the wonderful group of patriotic men who surrounded him and united with him in this great enterprise.

David Francis had the graces of the courtly Jefferson. He, like Jefferson, was fond of music, of the dance, of literature, fine paintings, fine horses, courageous men, and amiable women. He liked children and the children all loved him.

Francis helped Grover Cleveland and supported him in office for eight years. He helped Rolla Wells and supported him for eight years. He helped Woodrow Wilson and supported him for eight years. But each President was his President; each governor was his governor; each mayor was his mayor. He believed in orderly government and sustained the office even though he did not approve the man.

Twenty-five years ago the Kentucky Society of St. Louis attended a homecoming celebration in that State. We visited Lexington, where the finest horses were exhibited for our inspection. I remember a great chestnut stallion, with delicate nostrils, small ears, arched neck, long mane, and flowing tail held high. He, by the way, was named "Governor Francis." They brought him out. The governor stroked his nose; he felt his fetlocks; he passed his hand over his glossy mane and the magnificient animal remained perfectly docile, seeming to sense the fact that he was being handled by a friend. A few minutes later another member of the party approached. The great stallion rose in the air, whirled, came down to the ground and kicked; giving his colored attendant much trouble in holding him. The governor stepped quickly to his aid, and the magnificent animal came to attention. I watched the governor with great interest on this occasion. His expression of keen appreciation, his distress at the display of bad temper, his gratification when the temper had passed, and the splendid animal had recovered his poise; the whole incident in fact was characteristic of the man.

Later, on this same trip, we attended the trial of Howard, a mountaineer charged with killing Governor Goebel. As we entered the courtroom a deputy sheriff stood guard at the door. The governor was first in line. The deputy politely asked him if he carried a gun. For a moment there was indecision in the governor's face. Then he smiled. The deputy sheriff said, "Governor, we will check your gun, put it in this barrel and I will return it as you leave the court room." He made the same inquiry of each member of our party. None made a deposit. I looked in the barrel as we passed by, and the bottom was covered with revolvers, each one bearing a tag with the owner's name.

Returning to the hotel, the courthouse incident brought on a discussion of old Kentucky feuds, fights, and duels. Joined by some of the "Kentucky colonels," the stories went back to the Indian days, of the frontier adventures, of Aaron Burr on the Ohio River, of the War of 1812, when Kentucky riflemen—amongst whom was one of Francis's ancestors—took the long march to support "Old Hickory" at the Battle of New Orleans, of the Black Hawk War, in which the frontiersmen held their cabins for an advancing civilization; of the Mexican War, and of the Civil War, in which Kentucky's sons divided. Someone told the governor the amusing story of my grandfather, Richard Hawes, whose inauguration as Confederate governor of the State was interrupted by Buell's artillery; how he finished his speech and rode out of the capital on a mule, shelled by advancing troops, with his speech and State papers in his hat.

This Kentucky history formed the background of the governor's life. He carried it with him in his association with men, in business, in charity, in executive office, and in diplomacy. It was the bold, assertive, determined quality of the frontiersman which had been transplanted into his being and moved his stalwart figure in the front rank of every occupation. He was of Scotch-Irish ancestry, descended from the men who fought for liberty, for tolerance, for local government in the crags and mountains of Scotland. He was a figure like that of Robert Bruce.

We all remember the long and destructive filibuster at the close of the last session of Congress, led by Senator DAVID REED, of Pennsylvania. Our senior Senator, REED of Missouri was trying to break the filibuster and secure a vote. These two Senators are distant cousins, both Scotch-Irish. In the cloakroom one evening a tired Senator was complaining of the futility and waste of time in the contest. Some one referred to the relationship. Another said: "They are both Scotch-Irish; what can you expect?" And one of the auditors, turning away, said: "They may be both Scotch-Irish, but for the last week it has been more Irish than Scotch." And so it was with the governor. Sometimes in fighting mood, the Irish was on top, and sometimes the shrewdness of the Scotchman prevailed, and when the two combined, it made the combination which has left its impress throughout America.

When young David Francis first came to St. Louis he founded his career on the old Merchants Exchange. That was the period when steamboats lined our wharves, when the Merchants Exchange was the heart and center of every activity in St. Louis. It was the place where the Veiled Prophet's Ball was born; where great public movements were inspired; from which came Seth Cobb, Governor Stanard, and men who contributed to our civic and State development.

On its floor each day there were miniature battles. They were gained by quick decision, by a strong voice, by a hand raised quickly, by an offer, or a trade, by a bargain, which men made without paper or signed agreement. It was one man's word given to another. It required quick thought, quick action, quick decision, and this early training was responsible for many of the dominant traits of leadership in Francis.

As president of the Merchants Exchange he quickly attracted city-wide attention. He was made mayor of the city. As mayor he grew in popularity in the State and, surrounded by a small coterie of loyal friends, the early political days of Francis, associated with Rolla Wells, Breckinridge Jones, Charley Maffitt, and Fred Zeibig, formed a group of big, patriotic business men who did things, and while attending to business and social engagements they made real contributions to political advancement.

Francis attended the wedding; he kissed and danced with the bride; he sent the silver spoon or cup to the baby; he acted as pall-bearer and followed the friend's body to the grave; he seemed to have time in the midst of a busy career to do these human things and become the best-known man in St. Louis. Travel where you might in any part of the world, and the query was, "How is Governor Francis?" His personality had carried far beyond the confines of his own State. In distant lands, wherever men travel, they knew the big Missourian. He was a "round-table" man, and, while fond of talking, he had the fine faculty of making other men talk.

Rarely did he go alone. He loved companionship. When he moved or visited, he was usually in company with two or three companions. He drew attention and held it; made other people do things under his inspiration who were unaware of the fact that he had caused them to act. He was proud of what he called his "thirty-six feet of sons." These six sons were selected to carry the father and chieftain to his grave.

As mayor of St. Louis, Francis gave a business administration. He paved the city, reduced the rate of interest paid on the public debt, bought the site for the new water works at the Chain of Rocks, reduced the cost of gas, and forced a great railroad corporation to pay a million dollars into the city treasury. As governor he attracted national attention by the vigor of his administration. He was a new kind of governor for that day. Putting business methods into operation, he resurrected and put the National Guard upon a permanent basis, passed the Australian ballot system, created a school-book commission and uniform textbooks, created a geological survey, established stable State finances, and followed the same course he pursued as mayor with industry and administrative understanding. He reorganized the State university, created an endowment fund and popularized that institution. As Secretary of the Interior he studied the problems of the West. His long and intimate knowledge of the farmer and grain was helpful.

Governor Francis liked the "big outdoors," and had as his field assistant William Zevely, a devoted follower and indefatigable worker of the same warm and genial character as the governor. During both administrations of Grover Cleveland, Francis was his close friend and political adviser. Their contact was intimate, and the great New Yorker relied upon his judgment in making political appointments.

He was sent as a delegate to the Baltimore convention in support of Missouri's favorable candidate, Champ Clark. He helped organize the convention; was one of the floor leaders who saw Champ Clark's lead reach a majority. Later he gave his tireless energy in support of Woodrow Wilson, and his popularity, wide acquaintance, and reputation as a substantial business man was of inestimable help in both the Wilson elections.

Although in very poor physical condition, Governor Francis attended the last Democratic convention in New York, and was an interested spectator during its long struggle. While ill health prevented active participation, he followed the fortunes of the Jefferson party with interest and enthusiasm to the end.

It was the followers of Jefferson who made Francis mayor. It was the followers of Jefferson who elected him governor. It was a student of Jefferson who placed him in his Cabinet; and it was a real disciple of Jefferson who appointed him ambassador. How appropriate then, in this memorial of Jefferson, is a discussion of the man whose distinctions in life came from the supporters of Jefferson. He was never offensive in his partisanship, and, while he kept his party's faith, he retained as well his personal friends. When he accepted his last political assignment he was three score and five. Far-seeing men at that time knew we could not long remain out of the struggle; the whole world was at war.

One of the scenes of greatest tragedy was in Russia, the country to which he was assigned. Its borders had been drenched in blood; its civil government was dead; it was a scene not only of civil decay and war, but it was the center for schemers and plotters of all nations. It was the spot where men of various nationalities were trying to destroy not only the bodies of men, but their minds. It was there that the great battle of propaganda was fought.

Governor Francis went not only courageously but blithely to his post of danger. It was his last call for public service, and he answered it. He left his family, and his business to the management of his sons, at a period when the perplexities and uncertainties of the time demanded his personal presence to preserve the fortune which he had built up during years of struggle. I remember his words, the fire and emphasis of his departing speech, in his farewell to his fellow townsmen:

"If my Government, in its wisdom, calls me to an important post which it thinks I am competent to fill on account of my years or my experience in domestic government, or in national or international commerce, I would be a poor citizen indeed if I permitted personal interests, or friendly associations, or love of ease, or even ties of consanguinity, to interfere or to prevent a favorable response on my part.

"Fear of jeopardizing whatever of reputation I may have gained in public affairs or in commerce is not one of my guides of action. If it were, I should be a coward, and unworthy of the respect of my fellows."

This was the Francis spirit. He went upon his duty and his duty brought his death. He accepted a position with nothing but hardship ahead, physical danger, and diplomatic uncertainty. The careful politician would have refused. The cautious diplomat would have declined. It was not a place in which to seek honor or publicity. It was an assignment of hard, dangerous, thankless work.

Francis's contribution to American history will be written later, but even now we know it will be a chapter of American courage. I was in Spain when a number of those who were attached to his embassy in Russia arrived. They sought me to tell of their admiration and love for their chief, especially for his courage in demanding respect for Americans. In listening to their praise, I felt a reflected glory as a fellow-citizen and a friend.

We remember the attack of the mob upon the American Embassy in Russia. Our ambassador sent the faithful Phil for his gun. "Stop," commanded the ambassador, facing the mob. "This is not Russian, it is American territory; you can not put your foot in here!" But the mob pushed forward. Again he said: "This is American territory. I will kill the first man that crosses the threshold!" The mob wavered. He displayed his weapon and the mob broke and went away.

No marines were there for Francis; no policemen. With his own revolver he stopped the mob. It was the fine old spirit of the frontier. It was part of the best traditions of Kentucky and Missouri. At that time he was not an ambassador; he was the frontiersman guarding the sacred threshold! When St. Louis erects the statue to the ambassador, I would have it a reproduction of this scene in the land of the Czar and the Bolshevik. Francis on the threshold of an American domicile; Francis saying, "This is American territory. I will kill the first man that crosses the threshold!"

Had he lived in the days of Scottish feuds he would have wielded a broadax or twanged a giant bow. Had he lived during the Crusades he would have straddled a horse and with vizor down charged the infidel. Had he lived during the Revolution he would have been one of the ragged soldiers who followed the tattered flag of Washington. He would have shouldered a rifle and followed Andrew Jackson to the Battle of New Orleans. These were not his times. But he was part of the World War and the last American to leave that living hell of carnage, rapine, and human slaughter. When government disappeared and torch and bomb struck and destroyed one of the oldest governments in the world he sent his secretaries and all of his attachés first, then followed last, with his faithful colored man.

The governor loved his country and would have sacrificed and fought for it at any period of its history. He was that kind of man. Just a few days before the armistice was declared our ambassador was carried by sailors on board ship at Archangel. This closed three years of service in a distracted country and was the beginning of the physical end. Even his great frame at his age could not stand the strain. But the break did not come until his full duty had been performed.

It must be remembered that Governor Francis never lost faith in the great body of the Russian people and predicted that time would bring a stable and sane government. And he desired to live that he might assist in the coming rehabilitation. Upon his return home one of our famous quartettes composed and sang a song. It was not classical, but it was the feeling of St. Louis then, and the city is of the same opinion now:

"He's a roving son of liberty, our townsman, and our Dave;
He saw the old red terror where the Czar went to his grave;
But he stayed right there on duty when a man must needs be brave;
And we're proud to get him back to old Missouri.
He's one of the war's great heroes, our own big native son;
He was there for Uncle Samuel when he needed things well done;
He held the fort in Petrograd, and didn't know how to run;
And he's mighty welcome back to old Missouri."

Governor Francis gave his old mansion, the scene of World's Fair festivities, the meeting place of business leaders and statesmen, to the Boy Scouts and the Junior Chamber of Commerce. He gave a park to St. Louis, a drinking fountain to Missouri University, and gave freely of his heart and brain for everything that went to make a better city and a greater State.

The governor enjoyed a story; he told good ones himself. He led the laugh; his was the hand that first applauded. He said the helpful word and slapped the back in approval. He was a gracious host and an appreciative guest. Always the leader; in civics, in society, in business, in politics, in sport, David Francis was first. As one of our papers editorially expressed it, he was "our most distinguished St. Louisian."

Let us think of David Rowland Francis frequently; call up his recollection often; and in this, the memorial he erected and named for Jefferson, keep a special place for him and the story of the part he played in the growth of our city, in the development of our State, in the national halls at Washington, and in the foreign land in which he exhibited the frontier spirit of Kentucky and Missouri.

UNITED STATES MILITARY ACADEMY

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, on yesterday after the passage of the bill (S. 4644) to authorize an appropriation for completing the new cadet mess hall, United States Military Academy, it was discovered that the House on yesterday afternoon had passed a House bill which is word for word the same as the Senate bill. I thereupon moved a reconsideration of the vote by which the Senate bill was passed in order to hold it here. Now I ask unanimous consent, as in legislative session, that the vote by which Senate bill 4644 was passed may be reconsidered; that House bill 14813 may be substituted therefor; that the House bill may be considered and passed; and that the Senate bill (S. 4644) may be indefinitely pstponed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The bill (H. R. 14813) to authorize an appropriation for completing the new cadet mess hall, United States Military Academy, was read twice by its title and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LAKE MICHIGAN BRIDGE

Mr. DENEEN. Mr. President, as in legislative session I ask unanimous consent that House bill 15333, just received from the House, may be taken up and considered. The same situation exists with reference to it as to the bill referred to by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED]. A House bill relating to the same matter was passed by the House on yesterday afternoon and immediately upon learning of that fact I entered a motion to reconsider the vote by which the Senate passed the bill (S. 4915) granting the consent of Congress to the South Park commissioners, and the commissioners of Lincoln Park, separately or jointly, their successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across that portion of Lake Michigan lying opposite the entrance to Chicago River, Ill.; and granting the consent of Congress to the commissioners of Lincoln Park, their successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Michigan Canal, otherwise known as the Ogden Slip, in the city of Chicago, Ill.

I now ask unanimous consent that the vote by which the Senate bill was passed be reconsidered and that the Senate bill be indefinitely postponed, and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the House bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The bill (H. R. 15333) granting the consent of Congress to the South Park commissioners and the commissioners of Lincoln Park, separately or jointly, to construct, maintain, and operate a free highway bridge across that portion of Lake Michigan lying opposite the entrance to Chicago River, Ill.; and granting the consent of Congress to the commissioners of Lincoln Park to construct, maintain, and operate a free highway bridge across the Michigan Canal, otherwise known as the Ogden Slip, in the city of Chicago, Ill., was read twice by its title and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FOX RIVER BRIDGES AT AURORA, ILL.

Mr. DENEEN. Mr. President, a like situation exists as to Senate bill 4744, granting the consent of Congress to the city of Aurora, State of Illinois, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Fox River within the city of Aurora, State of Illinois, and likewise with reference to the bill (S. 4745) granting the consent of Congress to the city of Aurora, State of Illinois, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Fox River within the city of Aurora, State of Illinois. Similar bills were passed by the House on yesterday afternoon, and I, immediately upon learning of that fact, entered a motion to reconsider the votes by which the two Senate bills were passed. I now ask unanimous consent that the votes by which the Senate bills were passed may be reconsidered and that the Senate bills may be indefinitely postponed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. DENEEN. Now, let the House bills be put on their passage.

The bill (H. R. 14473) granting the consent of Congress to the city of Aurora, State of Illinois, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Fox River within the city of Aurora, State of Illinois, was read twice by its title and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The bill (H. R. 14474) granting the consent of Congress to the city of Aurora, State of Illinois, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Fox River within the city of Aurora, State of Illinois, was read twice by its title and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

MULTILATERAL PEACE TREATY

The Senate, in open executive session, resumed the consideration of the treaty for the renunciation of war, transmitted to the Senate for ratification by the President of the United States December 4, 1928, and reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations December 19, 1928.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, when I concluded my remarks yesterday I had been saying, among other things, that there were several distinct views that might reasonably be formed as to the practical value of the Kellogg peace pact. I had said that one view that might reasonably be entertained about it was that it was a brutum fulmen, a mere pompous gesture, and that idea I endeavored to expound as effectively as I could. This morning I desire to take up two other views that might reasonably be formed about it.

One view is that it is even worse than a mere parchment futility, because its tendency is to lull our people into a false sense of national security and to lead them to believe that paper professions and promises can take the place of adequate naval and military defenses. In other words, it may be forcibly argued that the tendency of all sanctionless pacts, such as the Kellogg pact, is to create the impression that there is no need for a nation to rely upon the strong hands and stout hearts of its people and adequate preparation in the form of military and naval armaments for its safety at that critical hour involving its welfare, or perhaps even its life, which may at any time come. It fosters the feeling in the bosoms of a large element of the population of the United States, which seems to be becoming larger and larger, that to secure international peace all that it is necessary for us to do is to see to it that sermons, Sunday school lectures, and parlor or pink-tea addresses are delivered from time to time picturing the benevolent aspects and the blessings of peace; in other words, to use figurative language, this pact tends to develop the idea that peace can be secured by merely donning white robes, wings, and pious aureoles and crying incessantly, "Peace, peace, perfect peace."

That idea has been the death, as human history shows, of more than one free and independent nation. That was to some extent the condition of mind, as I remember at this moment, of the wretched Christians of Asia Minor who had been taught that when one cheek was smitten the only thing to do was to turn the other to the smiter, when Mohammed and his fierce adherents issued from the deserts of Arabia and brought down havoc, ruin, and death upon them. It seems to me that the danger at the present time is that the martial spirit of our people may become too enervated to face another great war. Surely the last World War is not so remote that we do not recall what a "lunatic fringe," to use the graphic phrase of Theodore Roosevelt, of imbecile pacifism, we had to brush aside before we could get down with our allies to the task of preserving the liberties and the civilization of the world. That such a lunatic fringe as that exists to-day can not for a moment be denied.

Only a few months ago a group of ladies called at my office and said that they wished my support for an amendment to the Federal Constitution which they were desirous of having adopted. I said, "Let me see a copy of the amendment." It was handed to me and I read it. It contained just two sections—one called for the immediate disbandment of the Army and Navy of the United States, and the other for the immediate destruction of all the ordnance and military and naval supplies of every sort of our Army and Navy. I said to one of those good ladies, "How would you feel if when you went back to Baltimore to-night you were told that the police force of that city had been disbanded, and that there was no reason, so far as police interposition was concerned, why your throat might not be cut in the dead of the night by some murderer?"

It was not until I used that illustration that the lady seemed to form any sort of accurate comprehension of what military and naval defenses are intended for.

It was only two days ago that another woman constituent of mine—no; I do the sex an injustice; I should have said—masculine constituent of mine wrote to me expressing the hope that I would vote for no addition to our Navy. I wrote back to him that I most assuredly would vote for the addition of 15 cruisers to our naval strength, and stated that I would just as soon think of not doing so as I would think of scrapping the pistol that I have kept for 30 years in a drawer beside my bed in my home in the country near the city of Baltimore.

It was only yesterday that I called attention to another proposed amendment of the Federal Constitution which for all practical purposes pledges this country of ours never to engage in war of any kind, offensive or defensive. If our people are further to undergo such degeneracy of spirit as I have illustrated, it will make but little difference to any powerful foreign country when the hour of provocative passion or ambition comes whether we have 120,000,000 people within our borders or not. So, I say that it is a reasonable view also to take of this pact that it tends, and dangerously tends, to produce a spirit of effeminacy in our people well calculated to render them incapable when the time comes of effectively meeting the exigencies of a state of war.

But there is another view that it seems to me may reasonably be taken of the Kellogg pact, and that is the view that I personally take of it and which will control my vote in relation to it when the time for ratifying it or rejecting it comes. And I not only expect to vote for the ratification of the pact but I expect to vote for its ratification without any reservations whatsoever, in view of the interpretative notes which attend it and which I think safeguard it, so far as it needs any safeguarding or is worth any, as effectively as we can reasonably ask. The tendency of the pact—I trust its not too marked tendency—is to substitute a peace psychology for a war psychology, to strengthen the disposition of our people to enter into closer working relations with the other great peoples of the world for the preservation of international peace, and to make it easier for us than it has been in the past to devise with those other peoples proper measures for that purpose. But, above all, I propose to vote for the ratification of the Kellogg pact because I agree with the statesmen of England and other European statesmen in believing that it at least measurably tends to draw our country into the only two institutions in the world to-day that hold out any real promise of international peace—that is to say, the World Court and the League of Nations.

It is perfectly obvious to my mind that some of the countries that have signed the Kellogg pact would never have done so had they not believed that it sets up a distinct, definite milestone for us on our way to the World Court and the League of Nations.

I know that this idea is not relished by all the Members of this body, whether on one side or the other of this Chamber; but, all the same, in my judgment it is a substantial, thoroughly warranted idea, as future events will doubtless demonstrate.

As I said a few days ago, almost all of these latter-day peace propositions have been suggested by our Government not so much from the desire to promote world peace as to provide for the exigencies from time to time of the Republican Party. There is in this country a powerful sentiment—there can be no doubt about that—in favor of promoting by all reasonable means the establishment of world peace. Consequently, whenever any important election comes along the Republican Party finds it necessary to concoct some new peace device with which to allay the impatience of thousands of its adherents. First, as I said a few days ago, it was the spectral association of nations conjured up by President Harding, only to be dismissed as soon as he was elected. Then, of course, there was the tremendous sheaf, which later followed, of arbitration and conciliation pacts, largely designed for the purely partisan purpose of drawing off the fire of the popular sentiment in this country that we should share, along with all the other great powers of the world, the responsibility of human civilization for world peace; and then still later those arbitration and conciliation treaties were followed by the imbecile suggestions of the present school of extravagant pacifists, altogether Republican so far as my knowledge goes, which would fain trust wholly to paper guaranties for our national safety. All these deceitful peace moves have either been initiated or adopted by the Republican Party for the purpose of preventing our country from getting back to the point where it fell into the tragic error of deserting the grand vision of world peace formed by that great statesman, Woodrow Wilson, and of allowing itself to be diverted into a pathway which has led to nothing except such "noble gestures," to use the language in the present debate of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON], as the Kellogg pact.

Nothing is more certainly written in the book of fate, nothing has the finger of God more surely traced upon the future of humanity, than the fact that sooner or later this country will revert to the World Court and the League of Nations and become a participant in the splendid, generous, humanitarian effort which almost all the civilized powers of the earth except the United States are making to bring international warfare to an end.

A few days ago the distinguished Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] said—I know he said it in no unkind spirit, because that is never his attitude toward me, I am glad to say, under any circumstances—that I was but an advocate of brutal force in the international relations of the world. In saying that he did me a great injustice. There is not a human being who cherishes a profounder, a more intense hatred than I do of aggressive war in all its ruthless and rapacious forms. I do not hesitate to assert that I think that the primary object of humanity throughout the world to-day should be to devise adequate means for holding international warfare in check. I do not hesitate to declare that to me it seems impossible that any rational man or woman can have anything but execration for war in other than its purely defensive forms. It is the greediest of all the rat holes into which the wealth of the world escapes; it is the vilest Moloch that was ever begrimed with human blood and tears.

The only war, aside from some purely domestic and defensive wars, that I can conceive of as having any palliative feature is war waged against war. But what I mean to say is that I can not imagine anything more visionary—I had almost said more despicable—than some vague, vain dream of international peace that is to be realized only by the bare will to peace. That is the kind of thing that the Quaker poet Whittier had in mind when he penned his line, "Peace unweaponed conquers every wrong."

If international peace is ever to be achieved, it can only be by institutionalizing it in the form of World Court and League of Nations, and by policing it with some such international police force as that which Theodore Roosevelt, with his practical intellect and vigorous nature, declared to be absolutely indispensable for the success of such a league as the League of Nations.

To that sort of peace I unqualifiedly subscribe. To that sort of peace I have endeavored to lend my feeble aid by every means in my power for years past. I thank God that, to use the inspired language of the Scriptures, to that heavenly vision at least I have never been disobedient.

But it is a curious fact, as illustrating the capricious and uncertain way in which the human intellect works, that many a man and woman in this country imagines that to secure international peace it need not be policed in any form at all, indeed, need not be backed by any sanctions at all, and that notwithstanding such men or women would doubtless set down anyone as an absolutely stark, irresponsible fool who suggested that crime could be kept under in a city without police coercion, or that crime and insurrection could be kept under in a State of the Union without having at hand for emergencies such a thing as a militia, or that rebellion, insurrection, and crime could be kept under in the United States without having at hand such a thing as an Army or a Navy.

I am glad that I am not one of those individuals in public life who are prepared to preach the mere gospel of despair with respect to the curse, the scourge, of international warfare. That war will ever be totally banished from the earth, of course, I do not believe, any more than I believe that crime will ever be totally expelled from the city of Chicago, the city of New York, or the city of Baltimore. But I think that the effective safeguarding of international peace, for all substantial purposes, is an entirely practical and feasible thing if only the right methods of preserving it are adopted; and that sooner or later those methods will be adopted. I harbor no doubt, as I have already intimated.

Therefore, entertaining the views which I have last expressed, I think that the wisest conception to form of the Kellogg pact is that, no matter how feeble its direct or immediate effect may be in promoting international peace, its face is set in the right direction, and that it may be reasonably hoped that the action of all the great civilized countries of the world in signing it will have some appreciable influence in ushering in the day when war will at least be sternly kept within very narrow bounds by the united efforts of those countries.

Mr. MOSES obtained the floor.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. NORRIS. I desire to announce that my colleague the junior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HOWELL] is detained on account of illness.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty-six Senators having answered to their names, there is a quorum present. The Senator from New Hampshire will proceed.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, the history of the pending treaty has been recited, here and elsewhere, ad nauseam. Its lofty purposes have been extolled. Its weakness and futility have been exposed and admitted. Whether it is a splendid gesture only or whether it is merely a feeble light—to choose from among the phrases with which it is characterized by its friends—is of little moment now that we know the determination of the Senate to ratify this instrument.

If the treaty had come here in the simple form in which M. Briand first proposed it, there would have been no obstacle to its eager adoption in order to signalize and to strengthen the traditional relationships which have so long marked the friendly and helpful intercourse of the French and the American peoples, each of whom is firmly attached to republican ideals.

But this could not be. A dream, as generous as it is grandiose, fell upon the American negotiator; and the Briand proposal, in its peregrinations between the Quai d'Orsay on the Seine and Executive Avenue on the Potomac, suffered a sea change into something rich and strange.

Even this could not have impeded our ratification if only the signatory powers to whom we presented the instrument had been content to take this treaty by its four corners and fold it to their breast. We would then have had a simple contract; its terms would have been applicable to all alike and we could have made the world the Christmas gift for which we heard so much clamor.

But this, too, could not be. No sooner had the aggrandized treaty been laid before the powers of the world who were invited to give their adherence than they began with one accord to exchange notes with our Secretary of State. The letter writing which this treaty has produced, Mr. President, is almost as if Lady Mary Wortley Montagu, in Protean form, had come to earth again and dwelt in most of the chancelleries of the Old World.

These notes bristle with what, in the earlier and more robust times of 10 years ago, would have been known as "reservations." Now, we are told, they are either "interpretations" or "understandings."

Whatever they are, they demonstrate that the Governments advancing them are keenly alive to their own interests. I do not know whether copies of all these documents have been furnished to us. I do know that in neither the official pamphlets supplied to the Committee on Foreign Relations by the Department of State nor in the document (No. 243) issued by the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, can one find the notes of the Persian, Afghan, Egyptian, Rumanian, and Russian Governments, all of which communications seem to me to have a familiar bearing upon the question in hand, because each of these Governments must have written as they did because of some familiar feature of their national situation which demands their attention and safeguarding. It is fair to assume that Persia had in mind the rivalrous spheres of influence which have for so long thwarted her freedom of action. The Afghan Government doubtless wrote with Khyber Pass in view. Rumania was not unmindful of Bessarabia, of the Dobruja Quadrilaterial, and of Transylvania. Egypt was thinking of her shackled sovereignty. Russia could not have been unmindful of the series of wretched episodes through which the sovereign, though silly, Soviet has passed during the last 10 years.

And to these we must add the most significant of the entire series of communications, the carefully prepared note dispatched by his Britannic Majesty's Principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Sir Austen Chamberlain, on the 19th of last May.

In this note Sir Austen, in numbered paragraphs sets forth the "understandings" upon which the British Government joins in making this splendid gesture proposed by the American diplomatic Delsarte. In paragraph 10—around which rages a discussion almost equal to that which centered about Article X of an earlier pact of somewhat similar import—Sir Austen sets up a Monroe doctrine for the British Empire. He does not shrink from displaying that sense of self-assertion which generally characterizes a British statement of a British position; and he employs language which, in a diplomatic document, has come to have a fixed meaning. When he says it is desirable to remind the American Government that there are "certain regions of the world the welfare and integrity of which constitute a special interest" for the "peace and safety" of the British Empire, he stakes out a claim upon the seas and continents of the globe to which there are no metes and bounds and leaves himself and his successors free to post a "No trespassing" sign at any time. And he makes known further that his Government assents to this treaty "upon the distinct understanding that it does not prejudice their freedom of action in this respect." Still earlier he declared that "His Majesty's Government have been at pains to make it clear in the past that interference with these regions cannot be suffered."

And yet, despite past pains to make this known, the British Government takes particular pains now to reiterate it! Sir Austen Chamberlain does not deem it "unnecessary" or "undesirable" to utter the fitting word to safeguard his country's interests, while we are expected to sit silent.

Mr. President, I can not do it. The President, through his Secretary of State, has performed a constitutional function by negotiating this treaty and sending it here. Now, each Senator, as an integral part of the treaty-making power, must decide whether the ratification of this treaty, in view of the antecedent circumstances of its making, is a proper step to be taken without some attempt to safeguard our country.

If we, by silence, recognize the position taken by other countries who do not conceal their views, we shall commit ourselves to leave them with a hand free to draw us later to support the decisions of a political body of which we are not a member and membership in which we have rejected with emphasis. Therefore, I am asking only that the United States shall exercise the same prudence which has been displayed by their excellencies the Foreign Ministers of France, Great Britain, Rumania, Persia, Egypt, Russia, and Afghanistan.

The imperious impatience of the Secretary of State is well known to some of us who have seen him display it here while he was yet with us. He was not always right then; and I do not think him right now, when he brushes aside the suggestions which we make with a sweeping assertion that they are "unnecessary." Even so, I can not see what harm is done by adopting some form of words to protect ourselves. It is better to be safe than sorry. I doubt if Mr. Kellogg, in his law offices in St. Paul, would ever advise a client, in the matter of a simple contract, as he now advises the Senate of the United States, namely, that in the event of a dispute the correspondence antecedent to the contract is of no consequence.

So far as international law is concerned, there is no rule more firmly established than the rule that treaties are to be interpreted according to the intent of the negotiators. It is not necessary to show that such intent was embodied formally in protocols and reservations. In order to discover the intent of the parties to a treaty, international tribunals admit parol evidence in the form even of private correspondence and journals. The purpose is to ascertain the interpretation clearly understood by any of the parties before ratifying the treaty. Thus, before the United States Senate ratified the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, Great Britain made clear by a note addressed to the Secretary of State that the provisions of this treaty did not apply to British Honduras, though, as a matter of fact, this procedure did not serve to eliminate completely later misunderstandings on that score.

It follows that every word and syllable of the preliminary negotiations between the United States and other powers prior to the signing of this treaty is of the utmost significance. Every public comment by any of the negotiators, whether by Sir Austen Chamberlain before the House of Commons, by M. Briand at the ceremony of the signing of the pact, or by Secretary Kellogg before the American Society of International Law, may be of the greatest importance in later interpretations of the treaty. Great Britain and France have most clearly placed on record that their acceptance of the treaty was conditioned by their interpretations of its scope and meaning. Great Britain, in order further to safeguard its position, filed with the secretariat of the League of Nations on August 4, 1928, three weeks before the signing of the treaty, a copy of all the preliminary correspondence.

It therefore becomes necessary to analyze closely not merely the text of the treaty, which contains a rather unusual phraseology, particularly its preamble, which is held to be a substantive part of the document, but also all of the "interpretations," "reservations," and "constructions" placed on the text in the course of the preliminary negotiations. Despite what I said a few moments ago, I fear I must enter upon a brief survey of the history of these negotiations:

M. Briand originally proposed the mutual renunciation of war by France and the United States.

Secretary Kellogg then proposed a general renunciation of war by all nations.

M. Briand countered with a proposal for the mutual renunciation of "aggressive war" by the United States and France, the other powers to join later.

Secretary Kellogg rejected any attempt to limit the treaty either with respect to "aggressive wars" or to the number of the signatories.

M. Briand thereupon enumerated the reasons why he hesitated to sign a general renunciation of war without any qualifications or limitations.

The United States submitted its own draft of the proposed treaty to Great Britain, Italy, and Japan on April 13, 1928.

France submitted its own draft to the United States and the above-mentioned powers on April 20, 1928, placing special emphasis on a most important provision concerning "obligations," which was later embodied in the preamble of the final treaty.

Secretary Kellogg, in an address before the American Society of International Law on April 28, 1928, sought to interpret the treaty in such a way as to satisfy M. Briand's scruples. This address was made a formal part of the preliminary correspondence in a note addressed by Secretary Kellogg to France, Great Britain, and other powers under date of June 23, 1928.

Great Britain, in a note dated May 19, 1928, formulated seriatim its interpretations of the proposed treaty. Sir Austen Chamberlain then observed that "the exact fulfillment of treaty engagements is a matter which affects the national honor. Precision as to the scope of these engagements is therefore of importance."

Great Britain formally accepted, on July 18, 1928, the American revised draft, on the basis of the specific interpretations the British Government had placed on the treaty, and in the light of Secretary Kellogg's "explanations."

The treaty was signed August 27, 1928, after all the parties had placed on record their understanding of its scope and meaning. M. Briand on this occasion stated that the purpose of the treaty was positive and not negative.

The question now arises, What are the exact limitations, qualifications, reservations, interpretations or "constructions" to use Secretary Kellogg's expression, which have been placed by the signatory powers to this momentous document? What are the exact engagements whose fulfillment is a matter affecting quite as much the national honor of the United States as that of the other signatories? The answer is not easy, but the following conclusions may be drawn from a study of the preliminary negotiations.

I. The obligations of the contracting parties under the covenant of the League of Nations are in no wise altered by the treaty. What these obligations entail can not readily be summarized, but the most important, unquestionably, is the obligation under Article XVI to cooperate in the application of sanctions against any nation placed under the ban of the League. What these precise sanctions are, and how they are to be employed has not yet been determined. Secretary Kellogg, however, has agreed that there is no inconsistency between the covenant and the pact. The United States, to this extent, would appear committed in advance to the recognition of the legality of these sanctions, even though they may directly and adversely affect American interests.

II. The obligations of the signatories of the treaties of Locarno are in no way altered by the treaty, although it should be recalled that in the event of a failure of the parties in dispute to find a peaceful solution, the Council of the League of Nations under Article XV of the covenant may be called on to apply the sanctions above referred to.

III. France has reserved complete liberty of action under its "treaties guaranteeing neutrality." Secretary Kellogg has stated that "the United States is not informed as to the precise treaties which France has in mind," though he can see no possibility of any inconsistency between their provisions and the present treaty. The treaties France has in mind would appear to be of the type signed with Poland on February 19, 1921. They might more accurately be termed treaties of defensive alliance for the purpose of "safeguarding the security of their territories and their common political and economic interests." A French writer, A. Fabre Luce, has said that "the Franco-Polish alliance hitherto has been very clearly the instrument of an anti-German policy." The United States, again, would appear committed in advance to a recognition of the legality of whatever action France may take under these treaties for the maintenance of the status quo and the preservation of the balance of power in Europe.

IV. Great Britain by its notes of May 19, and July 18, 1928, has formally reserved complete freedom of action in "certain regions of the world the welfare and integrity of which constitute a special and vital interest for (its) peace and safety. His Majesty's Government have been at pains to make it clear in the past that interference with these regions can not be suffered." What these regions are and what measures may be contemplated to prevent "interference" can not be defined, but Great Britian conditioned its acceptance of the treaty on the recognition of its full freedom of action. There is nothing in the correspondence to indicate any intention to restrict this freedom.

V. The signatories to the pact have reserved complete freedom of judgment and action concerning the right of self-defense. Secretary Kellogg states that: "Every nation is alone competent to decide whether circumstances require recourse to war in self-defense." Having refused originally to accept the proposal of France to restrict the renunciation of war to "aggressive" wars, the United States finally conceded the right to wage war in self-defense. No term would seem more difficult of definition than self-defense. It has been used to justify many wars, including offensive wars for defensive purposes. Does it warrant forcible interventions for the protection of aliens in danger? Does it include freedom of action by the United States under the Monroe doctrine? It would either seem to permit almost any use of force, or to require some limitation, if the treaty is to have any practical significance.

VI. A provision to which France and Great Britain have attached extraordinary importance, and which was inserted in the preamble at their insistence, reads: "Any signatory power which shall hereafter seek to promote its national interests by resort to war should be denied the benefits furnished by this treaty." It would seem quite unnecessary to state that all signatory powers would automatically be released from their obligation not to wage war against another signatory power which violated its obligation. It is a different proposition, however, to state that such an offending nation "should be denied the benefits furnished by this treaty." What are these benefits? Are they something more than the assurance that "the settlement or solution of all disputes or conflicts shall never be sought except by pacific means?" Professor James T. Shotwell, in commenting on this expression "benefits furnished by this treaty," argues that there is a "moral duty expressed or implied in this phrase, that the signatories to the treaty do not become the silent partners of an aggressor." He further states: "We are inclined to accept the view, almost universally held outside the United States, that the principle involved in this single phrase is at least equal in importance with that in the heart of the treaty."

It is evident that Great Britain, France, and other signatories are attaching a deeper significance to the treaty than a mere renunciation of war. M. Briand, at the ceremony of the signing of the treaty on August 27, 1928, asserted that "the state which might incur the condemnation of all its cosignatories would expose itself to the positive risk of seeing gradually and voluntarily formed against it a kind of general solidarity whose powerful effects it would not be slow to feel." Sir Austen Chamberlain stated in the House of Commons on July 30, 1928, that the importance of the treaty depended on "how the rest of the world thought the United States was going to judge the aggressor, and whether they would help or hinder him in his aggression."

Mr. Edwin James, the Paris correspondent of the New York Times, confirms this point of view by cabling to his paper: "Europe has gone right along expecting that the Kellogg compact means active aid on our part * * * what they say in the Kellogg treaty was an offer to help preserve the peace."

Mr. Frank Simonds, a constituent of mine of whom I am proud by reason of his unquestionable position in international journalism, says that "Europe believes that as a consequence of the new treaty, the United States will join in any league action to employ military and naval force against any nation pronounced by the league authority to be an aggressor, or at the very least will respect the naval blockade and the financial and economic boycotts which the same body may pronounce against any power." Mr. Simonds also says, "Europe has placed its own interpretation upon the Kellogg treaty. Sir Austen Chamberlain somewhat guardedly disclosed this when he said that the value of the treaty depended upon the extent to which we 'backed it.' He did not mean the extent to which we would be prepared to go to enforce the treaty. Both in France and Great Britain it was generally believed that our signing of the treaty was evidence enough that we were prepared to go a long way. Otherwise, the treaty was practically meaningless to the European mind."

The Right Hon. H. A. L. Fisher has expressed the doubt "whether opinion in Washington yet realizes how far these proposals go," and observes that after the treaty is accepted it will be far easier to open up the whole question of the relations between the United States and the league, as well as to reexamine the Monroe doctrine "in the light of the Kellogg principle."

From the foregoing analysis of the terms and the interpretation of the treaty the following deductions would seem permitted: First, that the treaty, instead of abolishing war, actually legalizes war. Prof. E. M. Borchard of the Yale Law School was entirely correct when he told the Williamstown Institute of Politics that "the treaty, now qualified by the French and British reservations, constitutes no renunciation or outlawry of war, but in fact and in law a solemn sanction for all wars mentioned in the exceptions and qualifications."

It seems to me inescapable that our Government, by its acquiescence in these exceptions and qualifications, has committed itself in advance to an implied recognition of the legality of action taken by Great Britain, France, and other powers, either within the League of Nations or in accordance with other treaty obligations. This includes the application of sanctions by the league in disregard of American interests, and in some cases probably in disregard of American public opinion concerning the merit of such punitive measures. We certainly have not reserved our freedom of judgment and action regarding the application of these sanctions; and Europe believes that we are committed, not merely to a rôle of passive acquiescence, but even of active cooperation against disturbances of international peace. This amounts to the abandonment of any possibility of neutrality by the United States. It means that, in any future war involving the great European powers, the United States would be in no position to contend for the freedom of the seas. It would mean the triumph of the historic British claim to ignore neutral interests. It would virtually mean that, having forfeited in advance any right of protest against action taken by Great Britain in accordance with its league obligations or other rights reserved under the Kellogg treaty, the United States no longer would have any need of a navy other than for ordinary police duty. England and France may thus perfect their own naval understandings without any concern regarding the attitude of the United States, once we have ratified this treaty.

The United States is now in the position, either of acknowledging the full implications of the treaty and committing itself whole-heartedly to all that it means in the light of the interpretations placed on record by the other powers, or of stating explicitly our own interpretations of the limitations and obligations we are prepared to accept. Professor Borchard is right in saying that our hands are tied, not the hands of Great Britain and France. "The reservations," he says, "are made at our expense, not theirs."

There are several ways in which our interpretation may be placed on record without rejecting the treaty. (1) The Senate may attach formal reservations which would require the assent of the other signatories upon exchange of ratifications. (2) The Senate may express its own interpretation of the treaty in the form of a resolution which the Secretary of State might embody in a note to the other powers in transmitting the ratification. (3) The Secretary of State might even now, in complete harmony with the procedure already observed in the preliminary negotiations, address a note to the other signatories stating fully our own official understanding of the nature of the commitments entered into by the United States. This note would thus become an integral part of the negotiations, and therefore would safeguard our position quite as much as Great Britain and France have safeguarded theirs. (4) A report in like terms from the Committee on Foreign Relations, duly read into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD here and made known to the signatory powers, would likewise serve the purpose.

My vote, Mr. President, is not necessary to the ratification of this treaty. Even if it were, I can not cast it unless one of these four courses is pursued. Other Governments have been frank and explicit in limiting their commitments under this treaty. We can not afford to be less so. We owe it to our own people even more than we owe it to other peoples to acknowledge the exact obligations we are willing to assume. We should leave nothing to implication. It is absolutely necessary to our interests and to our honor that we make our position so clear that there can be no misunderstanding now and no unjust accusation in the years to come.

There may be those who are willing to "go it blind" in the matter of our relations with the rest of the world. I am not of that number.

CONTROL OF PRINT-PAPER SUPPLY

Mr. SCHALL. Mr. President, as in legislative session, I introduce a resolution which I ask to have read, and in connection therewith, two editorials which I am sending to the desk.

The resolution (S. Res. 292) was read, as follows:

Whereas it is announced in the December 22 issue of a weekly newspaper trade magazine known as Editor and Publisher that a certain group of men controlling the white-paper business of the world have purchased a controlling interest in a chain of American newspapers at a cost of $16,000,000, and that such group is also prepared to purchase the controlling interest in many of the large daily newspapers of the United States; and

Whereas the men composing such group are not citizens of the United States but are citizens of foreign countries, and are making such purchases in order to induce publishers to make 15-year contracts with the group for supplying their white paper; and

Whereas if such group should control many of the big dailies of this country they might have sufficient influence to prevent the passage of a bill to utilize farm wastes in the making of paper and thus prevent the establishment of a competitive source for the supply of paper and thereby tend to place the publishers of the smaller newspapers of the country at the mercy of the group; and

Whereas in a series of syndicated articles by Blair Coan, a Washington newspaper correspondent, it is suggested that the 15-year contracts offered by these paper manufacturers may be for the purpose of preventing paper made from farm wastes finding a market when produced; and

Whereas it is essential to protect the smaller newspapers of the country as well as the farmers who produce the farm wastes which may be utilized for the manufacture of paper: Therefore, be it

Resolved, That a special select committee of five Senators, to be appointed by the President of the Senate, is authorized and directed to investigate the activities of groups of foreign citizens controlling the supply of white paper in the United States with a view to determining whether such activities would have the result of creating a monopoly in the supplying of paper to publishers of small daily newspapers, and to report to the Senate as soon as practicable the result of such investigation, together with its recommendations, if any, for necessary legislation. The President of the Senate shall appoint members to fill any vacancies that may occur in the committee.

For the purposes of this resolution such committee, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized to hold hearings, to sit and act at such times and places during the sessions and recesses of the Senate in the Seventieth and succeeding Congresses until the final report is submitted; to employ such clerical and other assistants, to require by subpœna or otherwise the attendance of such witnesses and the production of such books, papers, and documents, to administer such oaths, and to take such testimony and make such expenditures as it deems advisable. The cost of stenographic services to report such hearings shall not be in excess of 25 cents per hundred words. The expenses of the committee, which shall not exceed $25,000, shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers approved by the chairman.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, the Senator from Minnesota is raising a very important question in this body and before the country. That resolution ought to be considered at an early date.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HEFLIN. Just one minute.

Mr. President, America has realized the importance of conserving our forests, doing something to preserve the trees. If our people really knew how many trees were being slaughtered every day to make print paper to supply the daily and weekly newspapers and other periodicals, they would be astounded. An enormous amount of wood pulp is consumed every day.

The Senator from Minnesota has raised a question here, it seems to me, that will go a long way toward solving this problem. There are millions of tons of cornstalks going to waste every year, millions of tons of cotton stalks going to waste, and the Agricultural Department has already discovered and demonstrated that print paper can be made out of cornstalks and cotton stalks. If we could do that, Mr. President, and get this move started, so that we could use these products of the farm that are now going to waste every year, and have it take the place of the millions of trees that are being destroyed, it seems to me that it would be a splendid thing to do; and I am in hearty sympathy with the movement that the Senator has started. I am now investigating the advisability and feasibility of using cotton stalks on a large scale for making print paper.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, I rose to make the suggestion that the resolution ought to be referred first to the Agricultural Committee, since the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate has no latitude to consider the merits of resolutions other than simply to say that so much money shall or shall not be expended. It has been the practice, when a measure of that kind comes in, to send it first to the committee that would have charge of it if it were a legislative measure. I therefore make that suggestion. That has been the practice heretofore.

Mr. SCHALL. I have no objection to that being done.

Mr. JONES. That is what I rose to suggest.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, I am in sympathy with the efforts of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SCHALL] in regard to helping the farmer by making paper out of cornstalks and cotton stalks, and will vote for his measure; but I rose to reply to the suggestion of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] and inform him that two-thirds of the newsprint paper that we use in this country is manufactured in Canada and we send nearly $200,000,000 a year to that country in payment of paper. We are making every effort now to bring that industry into the South and into Georgia and the Senator's own State, and I have for three years secured appropriations for that very purpose, but this would not interfere with making paper out of corn and cotton stalks, which would not supply one-fourth the demands. The paper industry, it is conceded by all paper manufacturers, belongs in the South, because they do not have to cut so much timber in the few months good weather they have in Canada and do not have to keep it on hand through a large part of the year, as they do in Canada. You can go through that country now and see millions of cords of wood for pulp to make paper piled up to carry them through the winter, which could not be cut in extreme cold weather. In our section they do not have to do that. They can cut their wood every day and save the great expense of carrying such a large amount of wood on hand at great expense.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, does not the Senator think, though, that it would be very much better if we could convert the cotton stalks and cornstalks of the United States into this print paper, and save the forests of the whole country?

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, I agree with the Senator from Alabama that it would be wise to convert cotton and corn stalks into paper, but, as I said, this could only supply a small amount of the paper that we use. I stated that I was in sympathy with the attitude of the Senator from Minnesota in this matter and will vote for his measure. I regret that the experiments made in the South in efforts to manufacture paper out of cotton stalks have not been successful thus far. They claim they could not get sufficient cotton stalks. I am not referring to the experiments the Agricultural Department has made to manufacture paper from southern pine under the appropriation I secured.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I differ with the Senator on that. The suggestion was made, when the experiment was made successful by the department, that we already have print paper made out of it. I have seen some of it. The Government has it on hand. The question they raised was of gathering these stalks together in large quantity at central points. At that time there was no machinery by which they could be pulled up and raked up in piles. We have such machinery now, I understand, just as you cut wheat or hay. They do that with machinery. It is run by motor power or by horse teams; and these stalks are ploughed up every year, or they are pulled up and thrown aside. Now, with the machinery that has been provided to rake up these stalks they can be accumulated, packed in a bale just like hay, and turned into a splendid industry for the farmer. The same can be said of the cornstalk; and it would be a great industry to the farmers of the South and West, and it would also help to conserve our forests.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SHIPSTEAD in the chair). The Senator from Minnesota has the floor.

Mr. SCHALL. I asked unanimous consent to have those articles read. I wish to have them read.

Mr. JONES. Will not the Senator permit the resolution to be referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry?

Mr. SCHALL. Yes; I am satisfied to have it go to that committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

The Senator from Minnesota asks unanimous consent to have certain newspaper articles read. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the articles will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

SIXTEEN MILLION TO BE USED TO DEFEAT MEASURE TO MAKE CORNSTALK PAPER—CANADA HAS UNITED STATES PRESS BY THE THROAT—WASHINGTON CORRESPONDENTS SAY NOTHING ABOUT SITUATION

By Blair Coan

WASHINGTON, D. C., January 4.—A fund of $16,000,000 was raised last week by the foreign newsprint paper manufacturers to defeat Senator SCHALL'S bill which will manufacture the paper we are now importing, from farm wastes such as cornstalks, flax, rice, and wheat straw, and sugar-cane pulp. This money is not to be paid in "graft" either to legislators or newspaper correspondents who help suppress the bill's passage; but is to be given to newspapers in need of finance, who will sign a 15-year paper contract with these foreigners, so that when Senator SCHALL'S bill passes there will be no market for 15 years for the paper made from waste farm products.

Although the fact that this fund has been raised and expended and that the newsprint manufacturers have quietly announced they are in a position to furnish at least $100,000,000 more is generally known, not a Washington newspaper correspondent has "peeped" on the proposition. While the papers they represent are being hedged about so that shortly they will be forced to give up most of their yearly profits to this newsprint-paper combination, these correspondents have remained dumb and allowed their newspapers to be drawn into this financial vortex, when the simple exposure of the proposition would have been invaluable to their employers.

These are the same newspaper correspondents who remained silent when the Schall farm-waste newsprint paper bill was introduced to help the farmer.

The seeming sad part of the whole affair to me is that the buying of our American newspapers is in the hands of the Premiers of Ontario and Quebec, so that when it is all over and the ownership transferred our press will be in the hands of the Canadians. With the United States, the wealthiest country of the world, it does seem that we should be able to finance and operate our own newspapers without foreign assistance, despite our dumb legislators and "hookworm" Washington correspondents. But it is manifestly unfair to include all of the 300 Washington correspondents in this list, because there are 6 who did send out the news on the Schall farm-waste paper bill.

Of course, we Americans are very trusting and not prone to think evil of our neighbors, but we might reasonably be suspicious of a combination owning all our daily papers. We might imagine that once they secure control of our press they will not allow the passage of the bill to make our paper from our farm wastes. They might even be as energetic in opposition to its passage as our Washington newspaper correspondents are apathetic.

Mr. Roy C. Hollis, the general manager of the New York Daily News, says he is not concerned about the purchase of our newspapers by foreigners as long as they confine themselves to the purchase of the preferred stocks of our papers. However, Mr. Hollis does not explain how he is going to confine their purchases to this class of stock; and besides, Mr. Hollis's employers own a large paper mill in Canada; and it would not be diplomatic for him to attack the Canadian purchasers.

Summing up the total it is not difficult to arrive at this conclusion: If the Premiers of Ontario and Quebec buy our large daily newspapers and should attempt to control our national policy on making paper from farm wastes, the smaller newspapers of the country will be at the mercy of this paper-newspaper combination, which would have the power should it care to exert it to raise the price on newsprint paper to a point where the smaller newspapers would have to either suspend or turn their properties over to Canadians.

The interesting thing to watch will be how the newspapers will attempt to defend themselves against this foreign newspaper combination as well as from their own Washington newspaper correspondents.

NEWSPRINT MEN FINANCING NEWSPAPER DEALS—BUYING PREFERRED STOCK IN PUBLICATIONS NEEDING CAPITAL IN RETURN FOR 15-YEAR CONTRACTS—ONE CHAIN REPORTED FINANCED IS CAPITALIZED AT $16,000,000—AMERICAN NEWSPAPER PUBLISHERS' ASSOCIATION MAY CALL SPECIAL CONVENTION

By Philip Schuyler

Newsprint manufacturers are in the market for newspaper preferred stock, financing publishers who need capital in return for 15-year paper contracts.

A publisher of a group of newspapers who has been approached by two of the manufacturers this week told Editor and Publisher about the offers being made and declared he knew of instances where "newsprint money" had been accepted.

It was explained that the paper men were prepared to offer much cheaper money than the bankers. Their purchase of preferred stock involves none of the brokerage expenses incident to floating a bond issue. The deal affords the manufacturers the advantage of an assured market for their product for a definite number of years, a condition, which, besides lending the company valuable security in these chaotic days, decreases sales expense.

A published report quotes a reliable authority for the information that one $16,000,000 corporation has been backed by a newsprint manufacturer for the purpose of assuring itself an outlet for its print. The corporation so backed is reported to have already acquired 3 dailies and to want 40 or 50 more. Papers are not necessarily being bought outright for this chain, according to the story, but 51 per cent of the stock is being acquired.

International Paper Co. has been mentioned most frequently in reports of financing or proposed financing of newspaper properties. A. R. Graustein and his spokesman, N. C. Head, assistant to the president, have refused to confirm or deny the reports when they have been brought to them. Editor and Publisher has published the fact that a lawyer representing himself as an attorney for International was one of the unsuccessful bidders for Il Progresso, New York Italian daily, recently sold at auction.

With manufacturers thus preparing to market their own production irrespective of agreements supposedly in the making, a preparation which has given rise to rumors Editor and Publisher has been hearing for several months, additional credence is being given to the viewpoint expressed this week that the manufacturers will continue their own independent ways and fail to reach an agreement controlling either price or production.

On December 14 and 15, as forecast exclusively by Editor and Publisher last week, the American Newspaper Publishers' Association took a stand favoring a free newsprint market and opposed to any agreement which would provide for a board of control to govern production, distribution, and to some extent prices, as described in the interview granted by Premier Taschereau, of Quebec.

If the newsprint price is taken out of the realm of free competition and put into the hands of a "board of control, directors of the American Newspaper Publishers' Association intend to call a special convention of members in New York for a full discussion of the situation and the adoption of such measures as may be calculated to conserve the best interests of the newspaper industry," S. E. Thomason, chairman of the American Newspaper Publishers' Association paper committee, told members this week.

This week the manufacturers were back in Montreal considering American Newspaper Publishers' Association's stand in addition to their own other worries. Once again the doors were locked. Those from New York known to be present were Mr. Graustein and Mr. Head, of International; Edwin C. Crooker and Mr. Chahoon, of St. Maurice Valley Sales Corporation.

Remaining in New York, Tom Waller, who has retired from active executive management in the paper industry but remains as a director of St. Maurice Valley, viewed the renewed conferences across the border with skepticism. He said the stand of the American Newspaper Publishers' Association would have little effect one way or another on the manufacturers reaching an agreement, but expressed the opinion that intelligence in the paper industry seemed to be at a low ebb at this time, a factor which might prevent stabilization.

"The fact that the American Newspaper Publishers' Association was opposed to an agreement might cause some ill feeling and some shifting of contracts, but there are no laws in Canada, such as in the United States, prohibiting agreements among units of an industry," Mr. Waller said.

"The publishers can not murder the paper industry; it is committing suicide."

It was Tom Waller who in 1926 predicted the exact state of affairs into which the newsprint trade has now fallen. He urged action then, but his pleas were unheeded.

Whether or not this newest Montreal conference will produce a real agreement will evidently not be known this week. International in paid advertising space will announce that with the situation unchanged it is possible prices will not be announced until January, next year. In the event that the wrangling continues into 1929, the International is telling customers prices will be retroactive to January 1.

Roy C. Holliss, general manager of the New York Daily News, which, using 100,000 tons of print annually, is an important factor in the situation, stated the publisher's side of the situation to Editor and Publisher this week.

"If the International Paper Co. goes through with its $50 a ton contract with Hearst, we will want to receive newsprint at $50 a ton," Mr. Holliss said. "If, however, Hearst is willing to buy his paper at $55 a ton, we will be willing to pay that price. We think there is something to be gained by not permitting the price for newsprint to get too low."

In regard to paper company financing of newspapers, of which he had heard, Mr. Holliss declared there was no basis for scandal or misunderstanding so long as the manufacturers with money to invest in successful newspaper properties buy only preferred stock. It would be another matter should the manufacturers buy common stock, entitling them to a voice in conduct of the papers, he added.

While, according to Mr. Holliss, the American Newspaper Publishers' Association is not making Mr. Hearst to agree to a change in contract conditions, it is thought very likely that representations are being made to him in this direction by the Premiers of Ontario and Quebec and other important leaders of the Dominion who are anxious to see the prosperity of the newsprint industry maintained.

Mr. Holliss is a member of the paper committee of the American Newspaper Publishers' Association, which met in New York December 14 and 15 with paper company officials. His statement sums up, in brief, a lengthy report made to the association's membership by S. E. Thomason, publisher of the Chicago Evening Journal and other papers, who is committee chairman.

Mr. Thomason reported that, so far as the committee could learn, the Canadian manufacturers have reached a tentative schedule for the ensuing three years. These prices were $55 for the year 1929, a $60 maximum for 1930, and $65 maximum for 1931. Mr. Thomason had also been informed that at the New York meeting with Premier Taschereau, reported by Editor and Publisher last week, International was told that unless it abandoned the intention announced in its telegrams of October 30 and December 5 and established for customers other than Hearst the $55 price for 1929, the government of Quebec would find methods to compel this action. The part of Mr. Thomason's report describing American Newspaper Publishers' Association's stand follows:

"The paper committee informed the representatives of Canadian manufacturers and the International Paper Co. that the publishers stood firmly for a freely competitive newsprint market, free of governmental or cooperative control, and that the representatives of the American Newspaper Publishers' Association viewed with alarm and distrust any efforts to control the price of newsprint which interfered with free competition. The manufacturers were further advised that the publishers had steadily maintained the position that satisfactory conditions in the industry could only be secured through maintenance by each manufacturer of a uniform price to all of his customers.

"The Canadian manufacturers advised the committee that a general price as low as the reported Hearst price would bring hardships to all paper manufacturers in eastern Canada, bring about inequalities in employment, and endanger Canadian forests by uneconomical cutting. The committee replied that the sentiment of many publishers had reflected the belief that newsprint prices fixed at too low levels would be of no advantage either to manufacturers or publishers. The committee stated, however, that the suggestion of price control by manufacturers' agreement or by governmental intervention could not leave the newspaper industry complacent.

"The paper committee sees in the present situation a threatened invasion of the publishers' rights through the proposed appointment of a 'board of control which will govern distribution, production, and to some extent price.' (The quotation is from an interview with Premier L. A. Taschereau in the December 15 edition of Editor & Publisher.)

"In the whole situation the paper committee sees a serious threat toward the uniform-price principle for which publishers have contended for more than two decades."

Attending the joint session of American Newspaper Publishers' Association directors and members of the paper committee in New York last week were E. H. Butler, Buffalo Evening News, president of American Newspaper Publishers' Association; William B. Bryant, Paterson (N. J.) Press-Guardian; John Stewart Bryant, Richmond News-Leader; Howard Davis, New York Herald Tribune; Mr. Thomason, William G. Chandler, Scripps-Howard newspapers; F. I. Ker, Hamilton (Ontario) Spectator; and Mr. Holliss. These publishers, after their own meeting, conferred with Mr. Graustein, of International, and Messrs. Chahoon, Rossiter, and Crooker, representing the Canadian manufacturers.

Newsprint historians are now pointing out that not since 1917 has newsprint sold at $50 a ton and in the intervening period contract prices rose as high as $130 a ton. Quoting from the Bulletin of the Inland Daily Press Association:

"In 1914 newsprint sold at around $38 a ton and in 1915 the prevailing price was around $40. In 1916 it rose from $40 to $50 and in 1917 from $50 to $55. In 1918 prices were controlled by the Government at $57 and $66, with a further increase to $69 in 1919. A sharp rise in 1920 carried the price up from $80 to $100 and then to $110, from which there was a jump to the peak level of $130, which prevailed in the first quarter of 1921.

"That this was excessive is evident from the fact that it dropped back to $110 in the second quarter of 1921, to $95 in the third quarter, and to $80 in the fourth quarter of the same year. In 1922 the prevailing price was $70, with a rise to $75 in 1923. This was the only upward movement since the first quarter of 1921. In the second half of 1924 the price fell back to $73 and to $70 in 1925. The price declined to $65 in 1926 and has remained nominally at that figure up to the present time.

During the reading of the foregoing article,

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, would not the Senator be willing to have the article printed in the RECORD without having it read further at the desk?

Mr. SCHALL. No; I want to have it read. It contains some news that I think the Senator should hear. It is not very much longer.

After the conclusion of the reading of the article,

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, as I stated, I am in sympathy with and will support the resolution of the Senator from Minnesota, and I believe the Government should experiment with manufacturing paper out of corn and cotton stalks, but even if we make a success it would supply a very small per cent of the paper needed. In answer to the Senator from Alabama, I would like to say to him that on my initiative Congress has been appropriating money for three years in an endeavor to find the best forests for the manufacture of paper, and at this time it is believed that the southern pine will be the most available, because it is the only wood that will carry the expense in holding timber. The resin and turpentine taken out of the pine every year will pay the expenses of carrying, which is a very important part in the expense necessary for the manufacture of paper. The trouble with using Georgia pine to manufacture paper is the turpentine and resin that must be extracted, but this can be sold and will help pay the expense necessary in carrying the trees until ready to make pulp to manufacture paper.

The Government Forest Products Laboratory at Madison, Wis., has been making experiments under the appropriations I secured and they have manufactured a paper from Georgia pine that has been a great success, but they are still improving it. I first secured the appropriation for this laboratory work three years ago, and have been securing it every year since. They are doing a wonderful work, and I believe they will establish the fact that southern pine is really the best timber that can be used in making paper, and particularly so as the turpentine and resin will carry the expense of it. I sincerely hope we may also make a success in making paper out of corn and cotton stalks. Practically all paper manufacturers agree that the South is the place to manufacture paper in the future—the trees grow faster and they can work every day of the year.

Mr. SCHALL. Mr. President, in reply to the Senator from Georgia, I want to state that the Department of Agriculture has had appropriated to it something like $1,625,000 a year for the next 10 years to enable it to find out how to make paper out of some wood other than spruce. All their efforts have been devoted to using some sort of wood. The expenditure that is going on now in Wisconsin is tremendous. It is claimed in a pamphlet which has been circulated by the Department of Agriculture recently that they have known how to make paper out of cornstalks, straw, and sugar cane for 20 years. Yet they were the people who went to the Bureau of the Budget and had stricken from the bill the little $50,000 that was asked by the Department of Commerce in order to develop something for the farmer.

The Department of Agriculture has not been inclined to do anything for agriculture along this line, and it seems to me high time that we get busy for the farmer. We are going to have an extra session shortly for that purpose. The small sum of $50,000 that was appropriated for the Department of Commerce to find out how to make paper and how to make other things out of waste farm products was cut out of the appropriation by the advice of the Department of Agriculture, and it was Herbert Hoover and President Coolidge who put it back so the farmer would be given a chance. The Agriculture Department is doing fine work in discovering how to make paper out of other woods than spruce, but they do not seem to be inclined to do anything along the line of utilizing farm waste.

For 10 years the Department of Agriculture has expended millions of the taxpayers' money attempting to make paper from southern pine; but it contains too much rosin and turpentine, being too sticky to make the proper mixture; while the cotton stalks and cotton bran which we all know will make paper are rotting on the plantations of the South. The cotton and sugar planters of the South are losing more than $100,000,000 every year, while the Department of Agriculture goes merrily on spending millions of dollars to accomplish what would be a distinct loss were they successful. The destruction of the trees would dwarf our lumber supply and leave our southern planters profitless. Why not use the lumber for home building and other essential needs?

Millions of dollars have been appropriated; this last year, as I said a moment ago, $1,625,000 was appropriated to make studies into the best wood from which to make paper, but no effort is made to do anything along the line of utilizing the farm waste.

Let us break this foreign monopoly of our newspapers by turning this billion and a half dollar farm waste to its proper use. Let us make the United States the controlling factor of the world's paper market and free ourselves from foreign domination and at the same time do what we are about to hold an extra session for—help the farmer. Allow the farmer to cash in on what is now waste and it will come mighty near settling the farm situation.

MULTILATERAL PEACE TREATY

The Senate, in open executive session, resumed the consideration of the treaty for the renunciation of war transmitted to the Senate for ratification by the President of the United States December 4, 1928, and reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations December 19, 1928.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, if the general treaty for the renunciation of war is an indication of what we may expect in the future, then we are on the threshold of a very interesting change in the conduct of international affairs. Apparently the treaty-making power, long the special prerogative of diplomats, is passing under popular control. The management of foreign relations was even in the United States clothed with secrecy and intrusted exclusively to the President and the Senate. But there is no doubt that the general treaty for the renunciation of war is a popular document and not a diplomatic arrangement. The idea of renunciation had its official origin in a public address. It was saved from discard by the public press. The negotiations have always responded to popular pressure and public desire. Here, at last, we have a treaty which may be said to have its birth in popular initiative and its approval in a popular referendum. The so-called diplomatic channels served in this instance their literal purpose as conduits of communication between the peace-loving peoples of the several nations.

The popular origin of the treaty has shaped its text. It is simple and brief, and it forcefully expresses a common aspiration. No precise rules of conduct are laid down. No definite standards of international behavior are established. No attempt is made to define or provide for the various contingencies that might arise under it. It is not a legal document but a popular slogan. It is more akin to the short commandment, "Thou shalt not kill" than to Blackstone's laws on homicide. No doubt there is a relation between the ancient commandment and the ordered civilization in which we live. So there must be a connection between the treaty of renunciation and the warless world to which we aspire.

What is the treaty? It is a promise of forbearance. It is a promise not to follow war as an instrument of policy. It is an undertaking not to seek the settlement of disputes except by peaceful means. Affirmatively the signatory nations undertake nothing. They do not promise to arbitrate their differences, nor do they agree to submit them to conciliation, to conference, or to adjudication. The treaty contains no agreement on the part of the nations to take their controversies to any particular forum or to abide by the decision of any tribunal. All they promise is that they will not employ war as an instrument of policy. In the event of violation no machinery of enforcement is provided. No sanctions are established. A breach of the treaty does not bring upon the violating state any consequences springing from the treaty. There is no obligation whatever upon any signatory state to punish a treaty-breaking state. The treaty, in other words, is not a contract. It can scarcely be called a legal instrument.

That is the treaty which has been transmitted to the Senate for ratification. It has been both criticized and praised. To my mind the blame has been too caustic and the praise too generous. It has been said that the treaty is the greatest step in the direction of perpetual peace taken in the history of mankind. It has likewise been called a futile gesture; a vain and unprofitable ceremony; an idle ritual.

Then there are those who believe that the treaty either says or implies too much. They read in the treaty obligations of every class and description destructive of our sovereignty and disruptive of our foreign policy. It is their view that the treaty should not be ratified unless it be properly insulated with reservations and interpretations.

It could hardly be foreseen that a treaty as simple in text as the one before the Senate could be appraised so variously. This diversity of opinion can perhaps be better understood if we attempt to classify this treaty into one of the categories into which peace proposals are usually divided.

In dealing with the war problem, thought in recent years has proceeded along two major lines. The first embraces the extension and perfection of the political instruments of arbitration, conciliation, conference, and the creation of a limited sphere for the adjudication of disputes. The league, the World Court, and the American arbitration treaties all fall within this category.

Another line was followed by those who were impatient with these political methods which, in every case, countenanced war, at least ultimately, as a legal and proper method of procedure. They favored the outlawry of war and its denunciation as an international crime.

In this scheme of things where does the present treaty fit? Obviously, it does not belong in the first, since it creates no new machinery, nor does it perfect any existing agency of arbitration, conciliation, conference, or adjudication. It does not extend the judisdiction of such present agencies to new controversies or to additional parties. Neither does the treaty, strictly speaking, fit into the outlawry program. It creates no court. It provides no code. It does not denounce war as a crime. It merely renounces its use as an instrument of national policy.

Plainly enough, this treaty is neither old-fashioned peace machinery nor the new-fashioned outlawry, and because it is neither some think it is not worth the ink with which it is written and others that it has ushered in the millennium. The truth, as is frequently the case, lies somewhere in between.

Let us ask ourselves the question about this treaty of renunciation: What exactly does the United States surrender? Is it really sacrificing anything? Is it giving up anything it ought to retain? The treaty renounces war as an instrument of national policy. That is nothing novel to the United States. If we read the history of this democracy aright we must conclude that the United States renounced war as an instrument of national policy on its natal day, 152 years ago. By the treaty the signatory nations agree not to seek the settlement of disputes except by pacific means. Is that any more than a summary of the underlying theory of our foreign policy? Three thousand miles of undefended borderland between the United States and Canada bear witness to the reality of that policy. Thousands of miles of boundary line divide this Nation into 48 independent and sovereign States and testify to the victory of peace over war.

As far as the United States is concerned, the renunciation of war as an instrument of policy is already written into our Constitution and our laws.

In 1848 Tampico was occupied by American forces. It became necessary to decide whether this constituted conquest to make Tampico American territory. It was held by the United States Supreme Court that it did not. (Fleming v. Page, 7 How. 603.)

In the opinion written by Chief Justice Taney the court said:

> The country in question had been conquered in war, but the genius and character of our institutions are peaceful, and the power to declare war was not conferred upon Congress for the purpose of aggression or aggrandizement, but to enable the General Government to vindicate by arms, if it should become necessary, its own rights and the rights of its citizens. A war, therefore, declared by Congress, can never be presumed to be waged for the purpose of conquest or the acquisition of territory; * * *.

The doctrine of resort to peaceful methods for the settlement of international disputes is written into every one of our treaties beginning with the treaty of amity and commerce with France in 1778; the Jay treaty with England in 1794, and the same pacific thought runs through the Root arbitration treaties and the Bryan treaties for the "advancement of general peace."

The point I am making is that war as an instrument of policy is contrary to our institutions and out of keeping with the genius of this democracy. The United States has renounced war and has resorted to peaceful means for the settlement of disputes throughout its history. This country is, therefore, surrendering under this treaty nothing that it has not already voluntarily forsaken—except possibly the right to change its mind. Should it in the future change its mind about its cardinal principle, then, of course, it will no longer be the Nation that the fathers founded. Even so, should it change its mind, no legal consequences follow from the treaty.

That seems to be a trifling price to pay for the adherence of the rest of the world to a policy which we advocate. For only by universal adherence does our renunciation acquire any general validity.

To my way of thinking no price can be excessive for the banishment of deliberate warfare waged in pursuit of national policy. Looked at realistically, there is nothing more cruel, more inhuman than these blood-spilling carnivals that we call war. I have heard war rationalized as necessary and, indeed, inevitable. So we once thought of human slavery; so some still think of poverty. We can not prove the contrary by any logical demonstration, but millions have the faith, and I share it, that war is no gift from Heaven; that it is a man-made curse stupidly fostered by those whose selfish desires it serves. Least of all, do I respect the cynic who mocks at every effort for the avoidance of war on the ground that it is part of human nature to fight and that human nature is unchangeable. The same argument was no doubt used back in the dawn of history when some one first suggested that self-help was a dangerous method of settling private disputes.

I am no pacifist. I never subscribe to the fallacy of peace at any price, but I do believe that the same human nature which learned to submit private controversy to peaceful settlement can likewise be taught to do the same with international disputes.

This treaty is very far from accomplishing that purpose, but because I believe that it leads in that direction I am ready to vote for its ratification. I see little merit in the objections that have been raised and no need for the reservations that have been proposed.

MONROE DOCTRINE

Considerable concern has been expressed over the possibility that the treaty is in conflict with the traditional policy of the United States known as the Monroe doctrine. We all know that the Monroe doctrine has more than one meaning. One historian, Albert Bushnell Hart, says:

> The number of doctrines since 1849 is about the same as the number of Secretaries of State.

We should, therefore, be clear as to what Monroe doctrine we have in mind when it is suggested that the treaty and the doctrine are at odds. Originally the doctrine represented a measure of self-defense. It has slowly evolved into an assumption of responsibility on the part of the United States. The treaty does not conflict with either phase of this traditional policy.

Where a European power goes to war with an American republic, the treaty is violated and the United States recovers its freedom of action, and can pursue the same course that it is at liberty to follow in the absence of the treaty. If the foreign encroachment is such as to threaten our safety, then in self-defense the United States would be free to take exactly the same measures as it can now in the absence of such treaty. In the event that a purely American situation calls for attention, such as the failure of an American republic to safeguard life and property of citizens of the United States or foreign nationals, then the interposition of the United States is not war and is outside the scope of the treaty.

THE ABSENCE OF SANCTIONS

The discussion of sanctions under the treaty reveals more clearly than anything else how debatable are even the most elementary factors in a plan for a world free from war. The treaty has been ridiculed because it provides no sanction and no machinery or method of enforcement of the promises to refrain from war. It has likewise been challenged because it is said to impose upon the United States the duty to punish, by force of arms if necessary, a treaty-breaking state. This latter criticism is absolutely without foundation. There is no language in the treaty proper upon which the most astute of lawyers could pin an affirmative obligation to do anything. The treaty as worded is entirely a promise to abstain from a certain course of conduct, to refrain from the use of war as an instrument of policy. Nowhere does it impose upon any nation the obligation to do anything affirmatively concerning controversies to which it is a party, much less in controversies to which it is a stranger. We need pay little regard to far-fetched or fantastic implications read into the treaty which have no basis in the language of the treaty. It is natural to assume that when nations speak in so formal a manner as a treaty that they do not assume obligations beyond those plainly stated.

The preamble of the treaty contains the following sentence:

Convinced * * * that any signatory power which shall thereafter seek to promote its national interests by resort to war should be denied the benefits furnished by this treaty.

The preamble is, of course, not a binding portion of the treaty. But even if it were, all that this can be stretched to mean is that with a treaty-breaking state the signatory nations are not obliged to remain at peace. Thereby, it is denied the benefit of the treaty which is a promise to refrain from war. It does not say that a treaty-breaking state shall be subjected to the penalties imposed by the treaty because none are so imposed. It has been proposed that the Senate agree to a resolution expressing its understanding—that the treaty imposes no obligation on the United States to resort to coercive or punitive measures against any offending nations.

Such a resolution is unnecessary and would serve only to complicate rather than to simplify the treaty.

It is more difficult to dispose of the argument that the treaty, by reason of its lack of enforcement machinery, is a mere futile gesture. It has been answered that no treaty has any sanction other than the plighted word of the signatory nations; that promises to go to war, like those found in treaties of alliance, have no better sanction than this treaty which contains a promise not to go to war. At the same time, we can not shut our eyes to the fact that this treaty offers no outlet for the disputes which will inevitably arise. This deficiency, however, in the treaty simply means that it does not go far enough. It does not justify a refusal to ratify. This treaty is an invitation to muster all efforts at further and better organization of peace.

WAR NOT ENTIRELY BANISHED

The international correspondence with which this treaty has been launched discloses the disappointing fact that it is not the absolute renunciation of war that it appears to be on its face. Force in international relations has not yet been entirely banned. The treaty certainly does not extend to force employed in self-defense, nor to wars against a treaty-breaking state, or in pursuance of sanctions employed under the league covenant and the treaties of Locarno, or in certain unspecified regions where Great Britain claims to be vitally interested, or in the exercise of our policy under the Monroe doctrine.

Not much need be said about self-defense. No treaty can or should ever serve to deprive a nation of the power to defend itself. No treaty can discharge a nation of its duty to defend itself. Neither can we complain of the fact that the treaty does not weaken the effectiveness of the Monroe doctrine, which has become for us a measure of self-defense.

Some of the other limitations go far to sustain the criticism that the treaty does not yet usher in a world where war is unknown. Recognizing, as I do, this deficiency I nevertheless maintain that it does not justify a refusal to ratify. It has been said that because the treaty does not extend to the subjects that I have mentioned, that it thereby sanctions such wars. I see no merit in that argument. Let me draw an illustration from local law.

Insanity is a good defense to an indictment for murder, so is sufficient provocation or lack of premeditation, but the law does not sanction killing by the insane, nor does it sanction provoked killings or unpremeditated homicides.

Neither can I see any validity at all in the suggestion that this treaty in some manner ties the United States to the League of Nations or to the European system of alliances and treaties. Neither the treaty nor the correspondence concerning it offers any basis for such a conclusion. True enough, Great Britain, France, and Germany expressed the continuance of their obligation under the covenant of the league and the Locarno treaties. The nations who are parties to these arrangements are concerned with them. The United States is not. They are bound by the terms of those instruments and they express the understanding that the present treaty does not modify their obligations. The United States recognizes neither rights nor obligations under those treaties. Our behavior in the event of violation under one of those treaties is left entirely in our own control. There is no occasion for a resolution expressing the Senate's understanding of that fact.

One of the so-called reservations that has been proposed in the Senate is—

That the treaty does not impair the right of the United States to defend its territory, possessions, trade, or interests.

If this reservation means self-defense, it is unnecessary. The use of force in self-defense is not the same as its use as an instrument of national policy. Only the latter use of force is condemned by the treaty. Who would blame the nation that fought in self-defense? The answer to this question is important, since moral pressure and public opinion are the sustaining breath of the treaty. It would thus needlessly complicate the treaty to agree to such a reservation and would leave the treaty open to very loose construction in those respects in which it is not reserved.

If the proponents of this reservation mean thereby to retain for this Nation freedom of action beyond legitimate self-defense, then they are goring the whole treaty.

Any reservation, whatever its nature, of necessity, limits the terms of the treaty. If I am right that the treaty is an expression of an ideal, a hope, a slogan, rather than a legally binding instrument, then reservations are out of order. The cardinal idea of the treaty is that war is renounced as an instrument of policy. Any limitation that we would place upon that idea is a confession to the world that some time, somewhere, when our interests may so dictate, we do intend to pursue war as an instrument of policy. I know that such is not the intention of those who offer these reservations. It is unthinkable that in an effort toward peace we should repudiate the significance of our history and the nobility of purpose which has motivated our foreign relations.

The treaty fails to denounce war as a crime. It fails to outlaw war. The nations have not yet legally contracted not to go to war. No instrument can well be a contract which as a practical measure is terminable at the will of any party and which, if broken, calls for nothing more than the resumption of the old order.

The treaty should, nevertheless, be ratified primarily as a great and lasting crystallization of the human will to peace, as an example of a popular treaty, rather than a diplomat's alliance. It gives basis to the hope that public opinion, successful in its first effort at treaty making, may push on to more substantial victories.

It is important that we do not make the mistake of believing that peace has been achieved. This treaty simply demonstrates that the people want it. It should now begin to breathe the spirit of faith amongst nations. The patriot who believes in peace should acquire his rightful place. The war makers' alleged monopoly of patriotism should be exposed as a fraud. Let every so-called statesman who in his heart plans to further some interest by resorting to war know that he is planning the dishonor of his Nation. In this modified atmosphere we can then try to create the necessary substitutes for the old war system, the use of which is now forsworn. The goal to which peace-loving people must proceed is the inauguration of a reign of law in international relations as it has been in our private relations. That means that we must have sooner or later a court with affirmative jurisdiction administering justice pursuant to an internationally adopted code of laws by which the use of war is not only renounced but denounced as a crime, and those who promote and prosecute war condemned as criminals.

Meanwhile the Congress of the United States is not yet discharged of its duty to provide adequately for the national defense, not only through armament but through the fostering of good faith amongst nations which will give us peace free of anxiety and free of suspicion.

Mr. DILL. I desire to announce that the subcommittee of the Committee on Indian Affairs is holding a hearing, and the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. FRAZIER], the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. PINE], the Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER], and the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS] are in attendance on that committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Sixty-nine Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, will the Senator from Wisconsin yield to me for just a few minutes?

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, before yielding to the Senator from Indiana I desire to offer a resolution in the form of a reservation to the multilateral treaty. I offer the resolution and ask that it be read at this time and that it be printed and lie on the table. I wish now to give notice that I shall call up this resolution at an appropriate time when the treaty is under consideration and ask for its adoption and endeavor to obtain a yea-and-nay vote upon it.

I now send the resolution to the desk and ask that it be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be read.

The legislative clerk read the resolution, as follows:

RESERVATION

Resolved, That when the Senate shall advise and consent to the ratification of the multilateral treaty now pending in the Senate that it be done with and in consideration of the following understanding and reservation:

SECTION 1. That paragraph 10 of the British note dated London, July 18, 1928, transmitted to the American Government, shall not imply any admission of any reservation made in connection therewith and not a part of the text of the treaty.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, war is a terrible thing. No one is more thoroughly aware of this fact than those who have worn the uniform in time of conflict.

Peace among the nations of the earth is the lofty ideal toward which civilization has been hopefully looking since its dawn. I suppose there is not a Member of this body who would not gladly make any sacrifice if by so doing he could usher in the "Peace on earth, good will toward men" so devoutly wished for. But the ideal and its consummation have always been widely separated, and the present situation among the nations of the world would seem to indicate that that consummation is yet far in the future. Still there is no good reason why we should not continue to work toward the goal, and all of us are undoubtedly imbued with the desire to hasten its achievement.

While Members of this body are clothed with great authority, they are also charged with enormous responsibility, and what we do here may vitally affect the welfare and happiness of generations yet unborn.

I suppose none will dispute the statement that our first duty is always to assure the safety of the American Republic, and in the consideration of every treaty that must be constantly kept in mind.

More than a century ago the Farewell Address of the first President warned against entangling alliances with other lands, and not long thereafter appeared the Monroe doctrine, stating as definite American policy that the United States would not look with favor on the attempt of any European country to gain a foothold on the American continents.

The Farewell Address and the Monroe doctrine laid down certain principles that were essential to the welfare of the Republic then. They are just as essential now.

Sovereignty in Europe at that time was considered to be in the crown. Under our Constitution it was and is in the people.

Then the European world was ruled by the monarch. America was and is ruled by the people.

Nor do the people of Europe have much more to say about their governments to-day than they had then; for, with the exception of a few countries, this is the age of dictators in one form or another.

For nearly a century there was no official recognition of the Monroe doctrine in the chancellories of the earth. We maintained it; Europe grudgingly observed it. But in the First Hague Conference of 1899 we forced its recognition and managed to have it upheld in the Second Hague Conference of 1907. When these accomplishments were consummated they were hailed as great American diplomatic achievements.

After nearly a century of struggle the Monroe doctrine was finally recognized by the foreign world as settled American policy.

To-day, only 22 years later, we are asked to ratify a multilateral pact to keep the peace among the nations of the world, with no mention whatever of the doctrine which has become part of our very existence, and without the maintenance of which our national security itself is impaired. Why this departure from established successful policy?

But it is argued that the right of self-defense is inherent, and that that right includes the maintenance of the doctrine. Then why not say so? Great Britain has not hesitated to state her position and make it an express condition to acceptance of the treaty.

Article 2 of the pact reads as follows:

> The high contracting parties agree that the settlement or solution of all disputes or conflicts of whatever nature or of whatever origin they may be, which may arise among them, shall never be sought except by pacific means.

The language used is very emphatic, as, for instance, "of all disputes or conflicts of whatever nature." Surely a dispute over the Monroe doctrine would be embraced in this language; and under the treaty, without a proper reservation, possible settlement or solution of such a dispute "shall never be sought except by pacific means."

But suppose, in such a contingency, pacific means were unavailing, then if we kept within the letter and the spirit of the treaty we should be forced to abandon the Monroe doctrine completely and for all time to come.

And again, what pacific means would be available? We should be forced to appear before some tribunal or submit our claims to foreign arbitrators, and then they, and not we, would interpret the treaty with reference to the doctrine, and if the verdict were adverse, this settled principle of American policy would be thoroughly annihilated.

In this connection permit me to quote the following paragraph or two from a letter received to-day from one of the leading lawyers of the Indiana bar:

> I have no doubt whatever that foreign countries, if the question comes up, will hold us to arbitration on the question, and when we arbitrate the Monroe doctrine, we surrender it.
>
> Take a hypothetical case not at all unlikely to happen in the next 20 to 50 years. Take Russia, or Japan, or China, countries of vast population, and infinite resources, and almost invincible when once organized, as they certainly will be in future years. Assume that such country, by amicable agreement, obtains a concession from Mexico, or a Central American State, granting harbor rights with a privilege of fortifying. The United States protests to both countries, and both countries courteously, but firmly, refuse to nullify the concession. The United States claims it violates our Monroe doctrine, and we then demand that the concession be annulled. Mexico or the Central American State denies that the Monroe doctrine is encroached upon, and asks that the question be arbitrated under the Kellogg treaty.
> Then what will the United States do? If we submit that question to arbitration, it means that we leave to a court made up of representatives of other countries to determine what our Monroe doctrine is and what its scope should be, and when we have the right to enforce it. This is absolute surrender of the Monroe doctrine.

Again, we have the Panama Canal, vital to our welfare. Many questions could arise with reference to it, not necessarily connected with our own defense; are we to be forced to arbitrate such questions with no freedom of action in case of dispute?

But why enumerate cases? Enough has been said in the course of this debate to put every American on guard. There is a considerable difference of opinion, even among members of this body, as to the exact meaning of the treaty. Is it safe to assume that there would be less confusion of understanding among the signatory powers?

I think we can reasonably expect as many diverse interpretative judgments as there are nations joining in the pact.

Then why do we not interpret the treaty for ourselves as we understand it, acting while there is yet time?

It is but stating a fact to say that Europe has no particular love for us, and Great Britain is especially bitter in her envy and animosity. Just the other day the dean of St. Paul's in London, referring to America, was quoted in the press as follows:

It is more than possible that the nations of Europe, enraged by the bloated prosperity and airs of superiority of "the man who won the war," will combine to draw Shylock's teeth.

It may be confidently assumed, I take it, that in this statement he is giving voice to the popular English view.

Are we safe, then, in leaving in the hands of a hostile world the interpretation, so far as it refers to us, of a treaty that has such far-reaching possibilities?

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, the Senator from Indiana knows, of course, that the dean of St. Paul's is generally known as the "gloomy dean."

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I do not care to discuss whether he is gloomy or not gloomy; I am simply stating facts and the language he used, and I suppose that he was reflecting the popular English view.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I promised the Senator from Wisconsin I would be brief.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Does not the Senator feel that that remark by the dean of St. Paul's presents a false picture of the feeling of the English people as a whole?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. No, Mr. President; I believe that the English people as a whole are very unfriendly to the United States.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I do not agree with the Senator in that.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I think that statements made by their own statesmen, even officially, and certainly unofficially, lead to that conclusion, and I think that most of Europe is unfriendly to the United States and very envious of our prosperity.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Only for a moment, for the reason that I promised the Senator from Wisconsin to be very brief.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, I obtained recognition from the Chair, and I yielded. I want to say this: That I do not propose to drag on this session to-day indefinitely. It will be utterly impossible, with these interruptions, for me to conclude within a reasonable time, with the length of time that is being taken. I therefore yield the floor for to-day, and give notice that upon the convening of the Senate to-morrow in open executive session I shall ask for the privilege of the floor in order that I may discuss the reservation or resolution which I have introduced.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I am very grateful to the Senator from Wisconsin for giving me this opportunity, and I will hasten to a conclusion of my remarks.

I waive any extended discussion of the League of Nations and its World Court, so far as they may be related to this treaty. I am opposed to our joining either the league or the court and am thoroughly convinced that the American people still stand squarely on the Farewell Address and against entangling alliances. They spoke emphatically on this question in 1920, when the League of Nations was an issue, and again, so far as they could, in the Senatorial elections of 1926 when the World Court was much discussed.

I am fully aware of the fact that many of the same people who sponsored those questions are now urging the ratification of this pact, without the dotting of an "i" or the crossing of a "t" and much of the old propaganda is in evidence. Nor am I unmindful of the fact that Europe hopes, through this treaty, according to Mr. Edwin James, of the New York Times, to involve us in European politics. In fact, the Times, in an editorial published January 4, under the caption, After Ratifying, had the following to say:

The peace treaty, even so, marks a great step in advance, but it is a step leading to something more. This is the reason why ratification of the treaty will be regarded in Europe as a sign, or even proof, that the United States proposes to return to closer cooperation with other nations. It is felt that the treaty will lead us, or should lead us, straight into the World Court. That tribunal constitutes one of the great "pacific means" to which we, with others, have pledged ourselves to resort. And behind the World Court, as its fostering parent, stands the League of Nations, which already exists as an organization able to make practically effective the pious aspirations of peace breathed in the Kellogg treaty. That instrument of peaceful intentions ought to be ratified. But it will be necessary later, in the legal phrase, to "implement" it by proceeding to more concrete measures and international agencies by which it may be made a living and continuous and effective force in the world.

All of which makes it imperative that we place our own construction on the treaty, with interpretations that will safeguard policies that are precious to us, and that mean so much for our continued prosperity as a people.

I may say in passing that I can not entirely agree with the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] in his construction of the treaty, nor in some of his conclusions drawn from the correspondence.

In my opinion, the conditions named by Great Britain amount to definite reservations, which would be considered by any tribunal in making an official interpretation.

Nor do I believe that the Monroe doctrine is properly safeguarded without more definite statement than appears in either the pact or the correspondence.

I am not so certain as he seems to be, either, with reference to the language of the treaty itself. It is so direct and specific that in my judgment it would be far safer for us to speak plainly on self-defense than to trust blindly to inherent right.

Other doubts are in my mind that can best be satisfied with clarifying pronouncements.

Grave matters confront us. We have but a little brief authority here. I hope we may so use it that the people, whose servants we are, may be benefited, not injured, and that the Republic may continue uninterruptedly on its glorious career among the nations of the earth.

Feeling as I do, using the best judgment of which I am capable, and following the dictates of my conscience, I shall vote for and whole-heartedly support a statement of interpretation that will preserve American policy.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, the most critical need of the time is an earth-wide organization for universal peace. Such a need is the most serious challenge to Christianity and to all the world to-day. Our civilization may be hopelessly impaired by another general conflict. Two conditions sustain this conjecture. The first relates to the horrors of modern warfare. Machine power and chemicals which have brought so many blessings in eras of peace may be utilized for unspeakable destruction, terror, and mutilation in periods of war. Even the airplane, so useful and so promising in commercial lines, may become perhaps the deadliest instrument of battle. Marshal Foch has stated that one of the great factors in the next war will be aircraft and that the potentialities of aircraft attack are almost beyond measure.

Before the close of the World War airplanes were carrying bombs and machine guns. Since the war their capacity in this regard has been steadily increasing. Already they are able to drop shells with poison gas which may asphyxiate a whole community, or shells with inflammable material and explosives which may sink battleships and cruisers, destroy the largest buildings. The heaviest bomb yet dropped has a weight of 4,000 pounds and its explosion on the hard ground makes a crater 30 feet deep, 160 feet wide. Modern warfare employs every human and material resource, making towns, cities, homes, fields, factories, lines of transport, and entire populations the sources and agencies of supply and by the merciless mathematics of necessity objectives of attack. The havoc which may be wrought by battle planes assumes such proportions that the soul sickens in its contemplation. The best resistance to aircraft is found only in the construction of larger and more efficient aircraft. If the recent failure of so many airplanes to cross the sea under their own power be cited as an argument against any serious danger to us from an air assault by other nations let it be remembered that airships of the Zeppelin type are able to carry planes, and that these airships have already made a number of successful transoceanic trips. Sea vessels for the carriage of planes, known as airplane carriers, are now in the navies of all the leading countries and can provide a base 200 miles from shore for an air attack.

Remember further that within the last few hours the airplane known as the Question Mark has completed a continuous flight, remaining in the air more than 150 hours and covering a distance of about 11,500 miles, being refueled while in the air.

The second condition warning us against another martial outbreak is the fact that the principal nations are now so dependent on each other for the essentials of economic existence and so closely related, therefore, in material interest that war between two or three will almost inevitably mean war among all, and may bring any nation, combatant or noncombatant, whose transport and trade connections with the outside are suspended, disasters beyond control or calculation. As an example of the mutual dependence of nations note our own Republic. In the production of the commodities and facilities of current civilization it far surpasses every other realm.

The boast has often been made that it is strong enough to live unto itself alone, without the necessity of looking abroad for requisite materials of manufacture and agriculture. In truth, however, we are so utterly dependent on lands beyond the seas for so many of these materials that without them our industry and our progress would cease on anything like the present scale. The ensuing discomfort, suffering, crises, social, political, and financial, might imperil that system of free and progressive government which is now the wonder of the time.

Consider steel. Is it possible to imagine American civilization of to-day without steel—steel the basis of the railway, the factory, the giant structures devoted to business, education, art, benevolence, finance, steel of which we produce 64 per cent of the world's annual output? Is it possible to envisage the results of any substantial interruption in the production of steel in the United States, the very corner-stone of our supremacy in world industry? And yet some idea of the dependence of the fabrication of American steel on other countries may be obtained when we recall that steel can not be made without manganese, that probably 95 per cent of the manganese used in the United States in making steel must be secured from foreign lands.

Observe the case of rubber. The mere mention of this article arouses an immediate vision of its fundamental place in industrial processes and in our everyday life. For practically our entire supply of rubber we must look to the remote reaches of the earth. Most of our rope fiber and half of our raw wool must come from abroad. We have a tremendous volume of agricultural products. And yet, with our original soil fertility beginning to decline, we find ourselves looking overseas for cargoes of two of the three essential elements of that fertility—nitrate and potash. Of neither of these constituents of fertilizing material, these necessities of plant life and therefore of animal and human life, have we an adequate domestic supply.

Turn now to the need of foreign markets for our own surpluses. We produce more cotton, wheat, tobacco, hides, copper, finished steel items than we consume; and these surpluses must be marketed abroad if many existing plants, investments, life occupations are to be saved from ruin, our country from financial chaos. Other nations are as needful of some of our raw materials as we are of some of theirs. No one nation of importance possesses all the basic products necessary to the sustenance and the occupation of its inhabitants. No one nation of importance is able to live within its own limits, and virtually all the nations, especially the leading ones, must rely upon each other not only for necessary materials of industry and life but for the absorption of surplus commodities.

Another condition of international significance lies in the rapidity with which machines are supplanting men in this Nation. As the output per worker increases with improved machinery and mass production, fewer and fewer persons are needed, and hundreds of thousands of human beings are scrapped with the discarded machines. Census figures show that in manufacturing production increased 29 per cent between 1919 and 1925, while the number of producers decreased by 600,000. Production per employee continued to rise in 1926 and 1927, the number employed in the latter year being still lower than in 1925. Nor is this situation confined to manufacture.

According to the Commerce Yearbook for 1926 increase in production per man in manufacture and railroad transportation was 48 per cent, agriculture 45 per cent, and mining 99 per cent between 1899 and 1925, the average increase for all four groups being 79 per cent, while the number of workers in these groups increased only 35 per cent, as compared with a population increase of 54 per cent for the same period. New employments must be found for surplus men, and markets for their products must be secured both here and abroad if internal order and progress and our living standards are to be preserved. Thus the inexorable necessity of foreign contacts grows as modern civilization develops.

For nations already overpopulated a decreased death rate, due to modern sanitation, advances in surgery and healing, as well as unemployment due to labor-saving machinery, will find outside lands and markets for men and commodities more necessary than ever to their own existence. Clearly the need of the world for organized and lasting peace can not be overstated. It is a need assuming the nature of a crisis, the atmosphere of a tragedy. More and more the world is becoming an interdependent economic unit, each part as a rule essential to the other, with no nation of importance able to live within its own limits.

Two consequences lie in the wake of such a status. Harmonious relationships will lead to adjustments for mutual benefit, for further growth, prosperity, and peace throughout the earth, or a struggle for raw materials, domination of new lands and markets will bring about perpetual friction, suspicion, and hostility, with the frightful shadow of another world war always in the sky. So long as the latter possibility remains as grave as it is our defensive measures must be kept in an efficient and adequate state. The League of Nations, a body composed of nearly all the civilized nations, is making the mightiest effort yet known to establish world cooperation on a permanent foundation, but the refusal of the United States, the most powerful country of all, to become a part of the league organization is an unquestioned handicap. This so-called peace pact is a relationship in which the United States joins with the rest of the world in renouncing war, at least by a common expression to that effect, and as a beginning in the right direction I shall support it.

It is true that the treaty under debate is surrounded by many understandings embodied in the correspondence among its parties which led to its formation. If a single nation fails to abide by its terms, all other nations are released to the extent of their relations with the offending state. The renunciation of war proclaimed by the treaty is not to deprive any nation of the right of defense, and each nation is to be its own judge as to when and how it may exercise such right. France holds that the obligations of the treaty are not to be substituted for or to prejudice in any way the obligations contained in the covenant of the League of Nations, the Locarno agreements, or treaties guaranteeing neutrality.

The Locarno agreements include the Rhineland pact between Germany, Belgium, France, Great Britain, and Italy, by which these nations guarantee individually and collectively to maintain the present boundaries in western Europe and a demilitarized zone defined by the treaty of Versailles; engagements between France and Poland and between France and Czechoslovakia providing for assistance by France to these countries in case of unprovoked aggression against them by Germany; engagements between France and Belgium on the one hand and Germany on the other never to attack or to invade the other and never to go to war with each other except in exercise of legitimate defense or in application of the league covenant against an aggressor; pledges between Germany and Belgium and Germany and France to settle by peaceful methods all questions arising between them. If any party to the engagements proscribing war believes that it is being violated, an appeal is to be made to the Council of the League of Nations. If the council sustains the appeal, all parties are notified, and all are pledged to go to the assistance of the state attacked. In cases of flagrant violation all the other parties may go at once to the assistance of the state attacked, the council in the meantime to make its decision, and the decision it makes, if by unanimous vote, to be observed by the parties engaging in hostilities. Germany takes the same position as that taken by France as to the league covenant and the Locarno agreements, asserting that the treaty contains nothing which will interfere with these instruments. Great Britain states that the peace of Europe rests on the Locarno stipulations and the covenant of the league, and that it must be understood that the treaty now being considered in the Senate conflicts in no way with these engagements. Great Britain stipulates further that the article in the treaty before us in which war is renounced as an instrument of national policy is not to modify its freedom of action regarding certain regions of the world whose welfare and integrity are vital to Great Britain's peace and safety; that, as has been made plain heretofore, Great Britain will not suffer interference with these regions; that their protection against attack is a measure of self-defense for the British Empire. Great Britain does not define these regions, but evidently Great Britain is applying the principle of self-defense to the British Empire.

Japan writes that it is understood that this antiwar treaty contains nothing that refuses the right of self-defense and nothing incompatible with agreements guaranteeing the public peace such as are found in the league covenant and the Locarno agreements.

The Canadian note calls attention to the fact that Canada regards the League of Nations as essential to international harmony; that Canada would not take any step that would endanger the league's effectiveness, but sees no conflict between the league and the pending treaty.

The representative of our Government, Secretary of State Kellogg, in a letter to the other signatory powers prior to the completion of the antiwar treaty and its submission for ratification points out that our Government construes this treaty as in no way impairing the right of self-defense, and agrees that each nation is to decide for itself whether it is justified in going to war in its own defense. The Secretary refers in this letter to a recent address of his, in which he took the position that the league covenant imposes—no affirmative, primary obligation to go to war.

That—

the obligation, if any, is secondary and attaches only when deliberately accepted by the state.

That—

there is no necessary inconsistency between the covenant and the idea of an unqualified renunciation of war.

That—

the covenant can be construed as authorizing war in certain circumstances, but it is an authorization and not a positive requirement.

I have used the exact language of our Government's representative in respect to the league because it puts the league in an entirely different light from that in which many attempted to place it during the years following the war, when it was so unqualifiedly denounced throughout the United States as a veritable war trap for this Republic. This American letter proceeds to show in what manner the treaty on which we are soon to act may be harmonized with the Locarno agreements and the French guaranties of neutrality to certain States, namely, by making all the parties to such engagements parties also to this treaty. A nation breaking either of the first two would also be a violator of the treaty, and thus the other nations affected would be free to act. We agree further in this communication that a violation by one nation of the treaty awaiting our action immediately releases any other nation or nations affected. In another part of the official correspondence leading to this treaty our Secretary of State asserts that it does not conflict with the specific obligations or the fundamental purpose of the League of Nations.

Such is a brief summary of the conditions on which this treaty is to come into existence, conditions as much a part of its structure as if they had appeared in its written terms. It is remarkable that all these limitations could become an invisible but undeniable part of a treaty containing these two apparently simple and innocent provisions:

First. The high contracting parties solemnly declare in the names of their respective peoples that they condemn recourse to war for the solution of international controversies and renounce it as an instrument of national policy in their relations with one another.

Second. The high contracting parties agree that the settlement or solution of all disputes or conflicts of whatever nature or of whatever origin they may be, which may arise among them, shall never be sought except by pacific means.

Mr. President, it is not possible to predict with entire accuracy what effect the understandings which do not appear in the physical body of the treaty may have upon its practical operation. I do not share, however, the fears and apprehensions that have been expressed regarding them. I am willing, sir, to make the experiment in the interest of the peace and safety of mankind.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. President, the history of the treaty and its meaning have been so thoroughly set forth in the speeches of the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, Mr. BORAH, and the ranking minority member, Mr. SWANSON, and the running debate in which the chairman answered the questions of Senators has so illuminated the text that no further discussion seems requisite, but as a member of the committee I wish to express very briefly my reasons for believing that the treaty is entitled to our support.

There are very different views about its effectiveness. Some seem to think that it is an insurance of perpetual peace; others that it is a mere noble gesture; others that it is an utter abandonment of our most cherished policies of isolation and security. I do not agree with any of these extremists, the pacifists who think that every nation can at once disarm and let the lion and the lamb lie down together; or the cynics who think that it is a hypocritical attempt to delude and appease a war-weary world.

It seems to me that everyone will agree that it is desirable that we should ratify it without any reservations or limitations unless some important national interest would be endangered. Although it originated in France, it was adopted by our Government, and gradually we became its sponsor and advocate, other nations yielding to our representations have waived amendments and accepted it in its present form; it is generally considered an American proposal, and for us now to alter or restrict it would look like abandoning our own offspring and showing less respect and confidence toward our own Government than the other nations have shown.

Is there, then, anything in its provisions so threatening to our security as to demand precaution or alteration? I see nothing. The explanation which Secretary Kellogg sent to the other governments with his proposed draft and which induced them to withdraw the various reservations which they had suggested amply protect us against any improvident interpretation. Indeed, the right of self-defense and the right of each government to determine for itself when that right may be exercised emasculates the treaty so much that its resultant weakness is the feature that can most justly be criticized. But probably it is wise that such a first step toward universal peace should be a slight one and should not run counter to so many national and historical currents of feeling as to make its observance unlikely. The great fundamental value of such a treaty is that the nations expressly and unitedly put themselves on the side of permanent peace by a formal agreement. That of itself is a vast accomplishment. As there are to be no sanctions, the main purpose is to focus upon one goal universal public opinion. That ought to make it infinitely more difficult in the future for any nation to inaugurate a war. It ought to make it easier to concentrate public opinion against the aggressor and determine who that aggressor is. For as we all agree to settle our disputes by pacific means, if one party to a quarrel offers such a resort and the other refuses, it is plain who has broken the treaty and who is the aggressor, and no nation will want to make war in face of the outraged opinion of the rest of the world.

To me that seems the great advance marked by this treaty. I think it makes peace more probable and a popular war more difficult. And, fortunately, the progress of our age, the explorations and discoveries of science are all working toward the same end, for they are making war more destructive and appalling and are also making victory more uncertain, as it may turn entirely on some new and unforeseen output of chemistry, and so the ambitious ruler or nation will have less temptation to embark on an enterprise whose cost is so terrible and whose result must be so dubious.

We must remember that until to-day war has been the greatest factor in history, always imminent and always the final arbiter of every dispute and the ultimate weapon of every ambition. It has been the instrument by which the boundaries of nations have been determined and both liberty and despotism established and supported. Despite its horrors it has always been looked upon as respectable, has been admitted by international law as an attribute of sovereignty, and an integral part of the relationship of nations. All that we are undertaking to overthrow. We are endeavoring to abolish and exterminate a force which the accumulating experience of thousands of years has habituated the human mind to accept as normal and inevitable and supreme. To tear from the universal thought of all nations such an ingrained habit can not be easy. We should expect it would meet with struggles and setbacks. We should not attempt too much at first. Those peoples who are most civilized, who most think and act for themselves, and those nations where the popular voice is most intelligent and most decisive will naturally grasp most eagerly and hold most tenaciously this novel and revolutionary idea of peace. For it is the masses of the people who are always the greatest sufferers and the least gainers by war, and when they have the intelligence to decide for themselves and the power to make that decision effective war is improbable. And that condition is more widespread to-day than ever before. Moreover, it is favored and advanced by the peculiar characteristics of our era. The marvelous discoveries of science and control of the forces of nature, which are our proudest distinction, have had a great effect on the relationship of nations. They have brought us together in a mutual knowledge and acquaintance which has vastly increased the spirit of cooperation and friendship. By enlarging and expediting the methods of communication they have prevented misunderstandings and made accord easier. And as a natural result of this increased intimacy there have developed among the nations associations and organizations whose tendency is all for peace. We have just had an illustration of it in the Pan American conference. We have had many instances of it in the League of Nations, and though I think it is fortunate both for us and the rest of the world that we are not a member of that league, though I think we are not fitted for membership, we do not know intimately enough the conditions of Europe, and we have a too polyglot population to judge impartially, yet I feel toward them the sincerest good will, and I think they constitute to-day an active and potent influence toward the peace of the world which we ought in every way to encourage and acclaim.

Mr. President, in our isolation it is hard for us to realize the feelings of those nations who have always been conscious of an armed enemy at their gates, whose frontiers were never secure against attacks, and over whom always brooded the dread of armed invasion. And as war has not been with us an ever-present specter, to renounce it is not such a wrench to our habitual attitude. But the fact that the other nations seem as eager as we are to undertake this experiment is cheering, and it is also favorable that the nations where the masses of the people have most influence in political decisions, and therefore where the side of peace will have the greatest support, are also the nations which to-day are most powerful and formidable and will bring the greatest prestige and authority to this new movement, just as, on the contrary, in those nations where modern civilization has least penetrated, where the body of the people are least informed about their political affairs, where they have the form but not the substance of democratic government and are unable to prevent constant revolution and warfare, where force alone secures peace, and where their international obligations rest very lightly upon them and are little restraint upon their conduct, the problem of renouncing war is more difficult and the power of moral obligation and public opinion as sanctions for the enforcement of the treaty is more dubious. But these nations fortunately are the weakest.

That happy and expressive phrase, "to outlaw war," is often applied to this treaty. It does not seem to me it is quite justified, though I wish it were. Outlawry seems to carry with it a little more resolute, militant, punitive spirit of hostility than renunciation; it means not only an abandonment and a condemnation by public opinion, but it means positive activity to run it down and suppress and exterminate it. It is more virile and less pacific than renunciation. It implies sanctions as well as aversions. Perhaps some time in the future that will come among all nations. Perhaps the force of public opinion upon which this treaty relies will be found sufficient, and it will never be found necessary to develop a more drastic assurance of peace. Perhaps, as a second step, there will be needed some diplomatic or arbitral or legal tribunal to which shall be submitted the ultimate and authoritative determination of the question of self-defense. But that will be for another generation to determine.

As Mr. Briand very wisely said, "Such a treaty means a beginning, not an end." How that end shall be attained, whether the means here provided shall prove adequate or whether new and improved agreements shall be requisite, experience alone can determine. It is our high privilege to make the beginning. The mere fact that all the nations of the earth unite with a single mind to abandon the historic and recognized instrument by which up to this time they have always planned to carry out their policies, gratify their ambitions, or preserve their liberties is of itself, regardless of all consequences, an impressive spectacle, and we may reasonably hope is at least laying a firm foundation for a new and better order. It is by slow and short steps that international progress is most secure. It may take generations to develop this first step into a steady march toward the millennium of peace, or this may prove of itself efficacious. Its very vagueness and simplicity may prove its most enduring merit, despite the scorn of cynics and the dissatisfaction of enthusiasts. Its central purpose is unmistakable and a universal acceptance of that marks a revolution. If the same force of public opinion which has constrained all governments to adopt it continues actively and sleeplessly to support it, the beginning which Mr. Briand conceived may itself prove to be the complete and beneficent end which he contemplated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Shall the Senate advise and consent to the ratification of the treaty?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I understand that debate is not yet closed.

Mr. HEFLIN. The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. BLAINE] gave notice that he desired to speak on this question to-morrow.

Mr. BORAH. Yes; I say the debate is not closed. I understand that no one else is ready to go forward this evening. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business with closed doors.

BURNING OF COLUMBIA, S. C.

Mr. BLEASE. Mr. President, before that is done I should like to ask permission to have printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Claims an article from the Columbia (S. C.) State and an article from the historical records of the Ursuline Convent at Columbia, S. C., in reference to a claim now before that committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Claims, as follows:

[From the State, Columbia, S. C., Tuesday, November 13, 1928]

BURNING OF COLUMBIA AS RELATED IN RHYME—JUDGE M. M. MANN, OF ST. MATTHEWS, RUNS ACROSS POETIC VERSION OF SHERMAN'S VISIT TO CAPITAL CITY OF SOUTH CAROLINA

Judge Marvin M. Mann, of the South Carolina bench, has run across an unusual description of the burning of Columbia. The judge, in looking over some of his mother's books recently, found a small volume of poems, written by Elizabeth O. Dannelly, originally from Georgia, but from Baltimore at the time the book was printed.

Judge Mann prizes the book very highly, but consented to let the State have it long enough to copy the poem from it for its readers.

THE BURNING OF COLUMBIA

Methinks there'll be emblazoned on the dismal walls of hell A record base, whose fiery words of fiendish deeds will tell, Through ages of eternal woe, to demons black with crime, How once, on earth, degraded men o'erleaped the bounds of time, And though they dwelt in human flesh, incarnate devils turned, When maddened by infernal hate they plundered, killed, and burned; Methinks the "Prince of Darkness," with a wild, sardonic grin, Will point exultant to a crime that won the prize from sin, And glory in a monument that tells his direful sway O'er Northmen who, with burning torch, swept happy homes away.

They came, a motley multitude, a God-forsaken band, With vengeance rankling in each heart, and blood upon each hand, And they stood with glittering steel on Carolina's banks, "Vae victis!" was the fiendish shout that sounded through their ranks. They looked across Savannah's stream with fury-glaring eyes, And trembled in their eagerness to pounce upon their prize. In muttered curses, mingled with the "howlings of delight," They longed to strike, with bloody hand, the stunning blow of night. And as they neared, with dashing speed, Columbia so fair, Their heavy tramp and cannon's roar that thundered on the air gave warning to her people that a conflict had begun, Whose deadly stroke would do its work before another sun. A carriage then was seen to leave which bore a flag of white, And men within whose bosoms burned the consciousness of right The army reached, in proper form, a noblt-hearted mayor Surrendered all, and begged the foe their lovely city spare. The sacred promise sought was given, but soon a shout arose Which told, alas! of pledges broke, and treachery of foes. Behind them desolation told the fury of their wrath; The light of burning homesteads threw a glimmer o'er their path; The smiling fields, all trampled, lay beneath the horseman's tread, And cattle o'er a thousand hills lay mangled, bleeding, dead. Half-naked people cowered under bushes from the blast, And shivered as the midnight wind with icy breathings passed; Fair maidens whose luxurious lives had known before no blight, With faces pale as marble, stood beneath the pall of night, While "crimson horrors" lighted up the wintry midnight sky, As on the ebon wings of smoke their burning homesteads fly. Till village after village by ascending flames were traced, And rising on the morning clouds with fiery arms embraced, The treasured stores of art and taste defiled and ruined lay; Rare paintings which had long withstood the touch of Time's decay; Rich tapestry of velvet soft besmeared with ink and oil, Where dainty feet once lightly trod, are now among the spoil; Rare furniture, superbly carved, pianos grand in tone, Beneath the ruffian's crushing stroke sent up an echoing moan; The gardens, types of Paradise, in tropic verdure dressed, All trampled by the vandal's steed, lay ruined with the rest; The cries of starving children rose upon the smoky air, And wild ascended piteous screams of women in despair; As far as human eye could reach a blackened desert lay, And o'er a stricken people hung the shadow of dismay.

On, on they dashed with mad'ning speed, "woe to the conquered," cried, "We'll burn her cherished capital, we'll rob her of her gain, And woman's prayers or piteous cries shall reach our ears in vain!" No summons for surrender came, but thick, and rapid fell Into Columbia's heart, the treacherous, bursting shell, The flying fragments bearing death to innocence and mirth, To children sporting, free from care, around the social hearth. To helpless women, feeble age, and victims of disease, Who fell, with terror stricken down, upon their bended knees.

An aged sire, with wrinkled brow, and silken locks of white, Was wounded by a missile sent, which took away his sight.

The wild excitement on the street, the universal haste, The people flying to and fro, the rush, the wreck, the waste, The "wilderness of baggage" sent on wagons to the train, The hundreds striving to get off, but striving all in vain, The children and the helpless babes of every age and size, Who added terror to the scene with sharp and fearful cries, The women trembling, pale with fright, who knew, alas; too well, The weaker sex no mercy claimed from men in league with hell,—Will be a sight remembered long, and long on history's page The record will be handed down to tell of Yankee rage.

A loud explosion ushered in that long remembered day, The depot at the dawn of light in smoldering ruins lay. A prelude to the tragic act the dark, infernal plot Which left upon the northern name a black, eternal blot. The clock upon the market hall had struck the hour of ten On Friday, that eventful morn, when entered Sherman's men.

High o'er a captured city now the "Stars and Stripes" they place To witness scenes of violence, of burning, and disgrace; A banner that once proudly waved—the standard of the free—Now floats above the tyrant's ranks the type of infamy. To take upon its sullied folds a deeper, darker stain Than blood of brothers in the cause of holy freedom stain, To wave above infernal scenes—fit prototypes of Hell—And with its colors dyed in crime, a mute approval tell; A flag that once o'er Washington a hallowed shadow threw, When in the cause of liberty, his gleaming sword he drew; A flag upon whose azure blue the brightest stars that gleamed Arose from where the southern blood in crimson rivers streamed, Whose glory fled when 'neath its folds no longer could we stand, When first it ceased to wave above a free and happy land.

The thieving wretches, one and all, their pillage now began, Assisted by the officers exalted in command. Woe to the honest passer-by who carried watch and chain, His arguments of prior right were uttered all in vain, For Yankees ignore all but gold, and no compunctions feel, 'Tis but the "Nature of the beast" to swindle, lie, and steal; New boots and shoes, or coats and hats, the same abstraction shared, And, all alike, the white and black, with gross injustice fared.

The jeweled hands of maidens fair, were sought, a brilliant prize, And sparkling gems were taken off despite of tearful eyes, Engagement rings of massive gold, their diamonds and their pearls, Now glitter on the brawny hands of saucy Yankee girls, And Yankee boards are shining now arrayed in silver plate Engraven with the honored names of South Carolina's great.

The relics of ancestral pride, by noble sires left, Are lost, polluted, sacrificed, to groveling Yankees theft; And Yankee cooks and chambermaids, now since the heartless raid, Flaunt out in southern women's lace and elegant brocade; Disgracing lovely womanhood, ignoring moral law, They wear, without a blush of shame, their "trophies of the war."

But 'twere a task impossible to write the endless list, The articles of precious goods that Southerners have missed; We "fell among" inhuman "thieves," suffice it then to say, That scarce a vestige of our wealth remains with us to-day. Not e'en the house of God was spared, the sacramental cup Was filled with liquor's burning draught for cursed lips to sup; The sacred vessels of the church were wrested from his hand, As, homeward bound, his steps were turned, the venerable Shand.

They plundered on, insatiate fiends, till near the set of sun, While Sherman looked serenely on, and whispered, "Boys, well done."

With vengeance written on his brow, and falsehood in his breast, He bade our noble, trusting mayor retire to his rest. Assured him that a "finger's breadth" his men would never harm, And told him how unwise his fears, how needless his alarm.

As well might we with childish faith believe the "Prince of Lies," For scarce upon the tainted air his false assertion dies, When, lo! the rockets darting high illume the brow of night. The signal bids the restless foe his blazing torches light; The savage sign thus being given, now bursting to the skies The crimson flame of burning homes in rolling volumes rise. The doom, the awful, awful doom, we heard the soldiers tell, With savage chuckle through their ranks, "to-night we'll give you hell!" With soaking balls of turpentine, and brands of flickering light, They ushered in, with eager hand, the horrors of that night. A rage of burning mountains "raised their flame-capped heads on high," And spouts of melted lava sent their torrents to the sky; The crumbling walls upon the air with thundering crashes broke, As o'er them rose successive clouds of black, terrific smoke, The embers floated on the breeze like stars of glowing light, And glittered high above the flames upon the vault of night; The elements of nature seemed at war with air and sky, And in convulsive fury swept like avalanches by. The grandeur of the awful scene no painter can portray, But graven on the frenzied mind forever will it stay.

Now rocking, with a deathlike shock, the ancient statehouse falls, And buries deep the lore of time beneath her crumbling walls. How many reminiscences of other days arise, Here, once assembled beauty, wealth, the honored and the wise, 'Twas here the voice of Preston rang with eloquent appeals, And battled for that principle that never, never yields; The mighty Hayne here nobly plead in freedom's holy cause, And labored for his country's fame, its happiness and laws; McDuffie stirred the people with his blistering words of fire, They quailed beneath his strong appeals, the maiden and the sire; And here spoke Carolina's son, her noblest, proudest boon, Who rocked the Western Hemisphere—the eloquent Calhoun. Long is the bright, untarnished list of Carolina's great, But ruined lies her capitol, the glory of her State.

In deep despair the women rush with madness to and fro, Receiving naught but taunting words and insult from the foe; They strive to rescue from the flames, a relic, but in vain, A demon grasps the captured prize, and hurls it back again.

Within a silent chamber now, where burns the lamplight pale, And prayers from anxious watchers rise upon the midnight gale, There rests upon a downy couch, a fragile form so white, And lying closely by her side, just opening to the light, Peeps out a tender, little bud, a tiny infant face, And love, in silence, reigns supreme within that hallowed place, The demons rush with curses wild into the darkened room, And carry to its inmate fair a sad and fearful doom. They grasp her thin and trembling hand to seize the shining rings, And terror o'er her livid face its ghastly pallor flings, They seize the watch beneath her head, and with it steal her breath, For, lo! her eyelids gently close into the sleep of death. Another suff'rer, pale and wan, is writhing in her pain, She begs for mercy of the fiends, but pleads, alas! in vain; With cries of murder on their lips and glaring torch they came, And wrap the drapery of her room in sheets of crimson flame. Under a mattress, rudely borne into the chilling air, While icy winds are sweeping by, she meekly suffers there, And bears, in patient agony, while cursing lips condemn, What woman, by the "stern decree," had suffered once for them. A widow, with her "little all," a bag of meal and flour, Had sadly watched her earthly store through many a weary hour, When, with a brow unknown to shame, a ruffian bore away The earnings scant, and pitiful, of many a toilsome day; He brandished in her mournful face a shining bowie knife, And threatened, as she plead and prayed, to take away her life.

Nor did the hardened wretches spare the children in their play; When closed the night, and dawned in gloom, another mournful day, A group of merry little ones caressed a sprightly pet, A greyhound, with its glossy hair, and sparkling eyes of jet, When, passing by, a bandit threw a missile at its head, and howling, bleeding, at their feet the little dog fell dead.—

A slow procession on that night, with faces deadly pale, Around whose fragile figures hung the long black sweeping veil, The nuns, in silent sorrow, left the holy shrine of prayer, While o'er their faces, pale as death, was spread a lurid glare. With trembling steps they sadly sought the "city of the dead," As from the hot, and crumbling walls, they terror-stricken fled, And there, 'mid hallowed, sacred dust, 'mid tombstones cold, and white, They passed in bitterness of heart that long remembered night.—

In Sidney Park where once the gay, and happy city thronged, There huddled, in promiscuous crowds, the old, the young, the wronged. The sick lay fainting on the ground, and to the mothers clung, In almost idiotic fright, their babes, and helpless young; They fancied here a safe retreat from crumbling walls to find, But, lo! redoubled horrors break upon the frenzied mind, When hot, into their ghastly midst with darting speed there falls, Hurled wildly from the heights around, with flashing, fiery balls.—

But there are crimes, far blacker still, too base alas! to tell, Too vile to e'en escape the lips, too near allied to hell, To contemplate would cause a blush on woman's cheek to burn, The thoughts of such infernal deeds her purity would spurn.—

But night removed her sombre veil, and morning came at last; Like maniacs the people stood, and thought upon the past, It seemed a wild, excited dream, a vapor of the brain, Too awful for reality, too fraught with mad'ning pain; But weary limbs and aching feet, as shelterless they roam, Remind the wanderers, pale and faint, they have, alas! no home.—

Ah! who can paint the shocking scene, the desolation wild, The black despair that reigned supreme where happiness once smiled.—

The sun revealed a languid ray of sympathetic light, As though his soul had sickened o'er the horrors of the night, He would not cast a radiant smile into the face of gloom, Or mock the dismal soul that mourned its sudden, awful doom; His brightest smiles were far too bright in golden light to fall Upon the frowning ruins there, the black and tottering wall.—

But o'er such scenes of blood and wreck my weary Muse grows faint, No longer would she human crimes, and human sorrows paint; Nor would she peer beyond the stage o'er which the curtain falls, The act behind congeals the blood, the tragedy appals. A glance upon the outer screen is all she dare bestow, Where only types of monstrous crimes in fainter outlines glow.—

So sad and awful are the scenes, whose traces can not die, The ruling spirit of the wreck fain his work deny; When devils that possessed his soul upon that awful night, By softer feelings of the heart are put again to flight, With human eye he views the deed, in terror stands aghast, And on the name of Hampton brave, the fearful blame would cast.—

Thorns fester in the southern heart, and do you ask me why? Time can not teach forgetfulness; the past can never die.

THE BURNING OF THE URSULINE CONVENT, COLUMBIA, S. C., BY SHERMAN'S ARMY IN 1865

(An abridged copy, taken from the annals of the convent, written by a member of the community who was an eyewitness)

On February 17, 1865, General Sherman's army entered Columbia. Reverend Doctor O'Connell, pastor of St. Peter's Church and chaplain to the Ursulines, asked a guard of protection for the convent. He obtained it—one man. On February 17, about noon, a cavalry officer rode up to the convent, spoke to the guard, and rang for admittance. Of the portress he asked to see the mother superior. To the superioress, Mother Baptista Lynch, he introduced himself as Major Fitzgibbons, a Catholic, and offered any service he, as an individual, could render. The reverend mother, not suspecting any danger to the convent, declined, at the same time thanking him for the offer. He, earnestly insisting, said: "Columbia is a doomed city; at least, that is the talk of the Army; and I do not know if a house will be left standing."

Such an announcement startled the superioress; yet she and her companion answered that such threats could not apply to the convent, since General Sherman had given a patron of the institution the assurance that her daughter, a pupil, was in a place of safety.

"Of course," replied Major Fitzgibbons, "I do not say the convent will be burned—such a thing would happen only by accident—but we all know what accidents are."

The nuns could not be convinced that danger was imminent. Finally the major persuaded mother superior to write to the general stating all the reasons she had given for her confidence of protection. He offered to be the bearer of the letter, and said he would place it in the general's hand. The letter was written and intrusted to the major. About 3 o'clock that afternoon Major Fitzgibbons returned, accompanied by seven soldiers, whom he stated to be picked men sent to guard the convent. He also gave to mother superior the envelope which had inclosed her letter to the general, and on it Sherman had penciled orders to nearest commanding officer to protect the convent.

Scarcely had the nuns given supper to the seven guardsmen and gathered in the community room for the evening when the alarm of fire was given. From the windows the nuns saw the city toward the south blazing. Calling one of the guards, they asked him to go for Major Fitzgibbons. He refused. Other guards refused other services. The nuns saw that no assistance was to be expected from them.

Reverend Father McNeal called to remove the Blessed Sacrament. The suppressed sobs of the younger sisters but feebly expressed the deep emotion that filled all hearts.

Parents came running for their children, yet knew not where to take them for safety. The danger became so imminent and the crowds of soldiers so great that the pupils and the younger sisters were given bundles of clothing and marshaled into line as for a promenade. At a signal given by mother superior they marched quietly out. Reverend Father O'Connell accompanied them to the Catholic Church—the wind being from that direction, the edifice was deemed safe.

About midnight, by the light of the fast-approaching flames, the plundering of the convent began. Heavy flakes of fire were falling over the premises. The nuns who had remained were admonished to leave. Reverend Doctor O'Connell wished to lead the nuns down Main Street, but the flames were lashing one another from building to building. As the sisters stood bewildered, not knowing their own city, a gentleman on horseback called, "Follow me, sisters; I will lead you to safety." As they followed flakes fell so fast on and about them that holes were burned in their veils and cloaks. In a short while, however, they were with their sisters in the churchyard.

The morning of February 18, 1865, dawned upon the group of nuns and children—cold, hungry, and homeless. Three families, whose nearby homes had escaped the burning, sent food, which all the group needed sadly and accepted gratefully.

Crowds gathered about the churchyard fence—some curious; some sympathetic. General Sherman rode up and was addressed by mother superior. During their short interview the general told her to choose any home in the city for a refuge and it should be protected. He appointed Colonel Ewing to see the nuns and children to safety. Colonel Ewing, learning that they wished to go to the Methodist College, came with ambulances to convey them thither. Finding the trustees of the college unwilling to admit the convent refugees, Colonel Ewing insisted, demanded the keys, and gave them in charge to mother superior.

Here the nuns and their pupils suffered much from overcrowding, scant food, poorly cooked—for they had neither kitchen nor proper utensils—and other discomforts. Colonel Ewing called often and, noting their sad state, reminded mother superior of General Sherman's words that she might choose a home. She said they had thought of asking for General Preston's mansion. Colonel Ewing asked, "Is that where General Logan has his headquarters?" Mother superior answered, "It is." Colonel Ewing replied, "That building has been ordered burned to-morrow morning when the Army leaves the city; if you choose it for your convent, I shall apply to the general to have the order countermanded." This was done, and the next morning the nuns took possession.

Mother Etienne Vassas was placed in charge of this house, where she cared for the invalid sisters; while mother superior, with the pupils and their teachers, remained at the college (now Colonia Hotel) till the surrender of General Lee and the return of families to their homes.

In May, 1865, General Preston and family returned. Mother Etienne and her charges left the mansion and rejoined their companions in the Methodist College.

In the latter part of August they were notified they must leave the college by September 1. They had no place to look for shelter. Day after day they vainly sought a residence for themselves and the 30 pupils still with them. A little later they found means of sending the pupils to their homes; and, acting on the advice of Doctor Lynch and other good friends, they went to Valle Crucis, a country seat belonging to Bishop Lynch (who was then in Rome, Italy), and situated about 3 miles from the city.

Later the nuns bought Valle Crucis; and there, under difficulties and privations that would adorn the annals of missions in pagan lands, the nuns continued their work of education with the heroism of true missionaries for 22 years.

REAPPORTIONMENT—ADDRESS BY HON. ARTHUR H. VANDENBERG

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may have inserted in the RECORD an address delivered from WRC, at Washington, over National hook-up in "Collier hour," Sunday evening, January 6, 1929, by the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] upon a very important subject, that of reapportionment. The address, I may say in a word, is not only a very able and a very eloquent one but it deals with a subject which ought to be of paramount importance to the Congress as well as to the people of the United States.

When the junior Senator from Michigan first began to agitate this question in the Senate, perhaps he imagined he stood quite alone, but I can assure him that those of us who come from the West, and particularly the representatives of the State which I represent in part, are very glad indeed to stand at his side in the endeavor he is making to enforce the Constitution, and to see that the constitutional provision regarding reapportionment shall be put into effect at the earliest possible moment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SHIPSTEAD in the chair). Is there objection to the request of the Senator from California?

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Fellow citizens of the United States: I bring to you a serious problem in violated constitutionalism. The responsibility, I regret to say, rests upon the American Congress. I bring you the challenge that these insidious contempts must end or their perpetuation will jeopardize the entire structure of the Republic.

I refer to the failure of Congress to reapportion the House of Representatives on the basis of the 1920 census pursuant to the explicit mandate of the first article in the Constitution of the United States. This may sound like an academic contemplation. But it is not. It involves the basic rights of the American people—rights harking back to the flaming protest of Revolutionary patriots who wrung from their oppressors the historic acknowledgment that "taxation without representation is tyranny." It still is tyranny. It touches every faithful heart and every loyal hearthstone in the land, because all that we are, all that we have, and all that we can ever hope to be are dependent upon the sanctity of our constitutional warrants.

Here is the existing mockery. The Constitutional Convention of 1787 liquidated the perplexing problem of congressional representation by giving each State two Senators and as many Representatives as their population should deserve by equal ratio. Then the convention ordered a census every 10 years and a reapportionment of Representatives pursuant thereto. Thus serial equity was guaranteed to all the people. The fathers recognized that this equity would be indispensable. Indeed, John Randolph solemnly declared that "if a fair representation of the people be not thus secured, the injustice of the Government will shake it to its foundations."

From 1790 to 1910 Congress never lapsed in this momentous duty. Each 10 years it took the census count and reapportioned the House of Representatives, never permitting more than two years to intervene between the enumeration and its honest validation. For 120 years, in other words, Congress kept faith with the Constitution.

Then came the nullifying interlude. The census was ordered again in 1920. But there has been no reapportionment since August 8, 1911. A sterile and deadly interim has evaded or ignored the plain and paramount mandate in the first article of our great basic charter. No country-loving constitutionalist can tolerate such contempts. This poisonous infirmity must be cured, and cured at once.

Here are some of the results of this congressional default:

First. The last reapportionment in 1910 was on a census basis which counted 91,000,000 people. By 1920 this figure was 105,000,000. In 1930 it will be 123,000,000. Thus the difference between the first and last figure—a difference of 32,000,000—counts the number of our people who to-day are virtually disfranchised. Nothing could be more grossly un-American. Nothing could do greater violence to fundamental rights supposedly established in 1776 and supposedly stabilized in 1787. Even on the threshold of Civil War, Lincoln found it possible to utter this confident challenge in his first inaugural: "Think, if you can, of a single instance in which a plainly written provision of the Constitution has ever been denied." It is a hapless but unavoidable reflection upon our own times to say that precisely this thing has happened and is happening now. The plainly written mandate of the Constitution is denied, and with it are denied the equal-suffrage rights of 32,000,000 American people.

Second. Great constituencies are victimized by this constitutional default. For example, my own State of Michigan has 2,000,000 people in three of her congressional districts, whereas under the old 1910 quota 2,000,000 people should count for at least nine districts. In the face of such disability, it is a travesty to talk of constitutional equalities. All of the following States are similarly victimized in greater or less degree: California, Ohio, Connecticut, New Jersey, North Carolina, Texas, and Washington. The founders of America would turn over in their graves if they sensed such ravishment of the constitutional guarantees which they so painstakingly ordained. If Congress were to permit a President to keep the White House eight years beyond his constitutional rights, there would be a revolution against such usurpation. It may be a less spectacular affront, but it is no less virulent anticonstitutionalism when Congress permits numerous of its own Members to sit eight years beyond their constitutional warrant.

Third. Even the honesty of the Electoral College is stained, because each State has a presidential elector for every Senator and every Representative. Those States unjustly deprived of Representatives are proportionately deprived of electors. In a close presidential year this might precipitate as dangerous a crisis as in the Hayes-Tilden campaign of 1876. It is insufferable folly to permit such hazard to exist.

Fourth. The greatest of all dangers is to the Constitution itself. Like any other chain, it is no stronger than its weakest link. We speculate with the life of the Republic when the Constitution is nullified, particularly when it is nullified in the Halls of Congress itself.

But, you ask, why does this situation exist? First, because those who would lose their seats under reapportionment often consult political expediency instead of hard, constitutional duty; second, because their colleagues are often too complacently courteous in the face of this dilemma and too prone to pursue the course of least resistance; third, because of the arguments over methods and limitations, which, in turn, defeat actual action; fourth, because the country has not given Congress plain and explicit notice that it wants the Constitution preserved—all of it—no matter who is helped or hurt.

This latter element is within the influence of those who listen to me to-night. Both House and Senate belatedly confront this reapportionment issue this January. If you are a sound constitutionalist—if you want the integrity of the Republic's foundations preserved—you can say to your Congressmen and to your Senators that you expect them to observe both the letter and the spirit of their oaths. You can tell them to validate the Constitution in this vital matter. You thus can make yourself count in the battle to save our common inheritance.

WESTERN NAVAJO INDIAN RESERVATION, ARIZ.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SHIPSTEAD in the chair) laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 3779) to authorize the construction of a telephone line from Flagstaff to Kayenta, on the Western Navajo Indian Reservation, Ariz., which were, on page 1, line 3, after the word "That," to insert "not more than"; and, on page 1, line 8, to strike out "Marsh Pass Indian Boarding School" and insert "tuberculosis sanatorium."

Mr. ASHURST. I move that the Senate concur in the House amendments. One amendment simply limits the amount to not more than $35,000. The other amendment simply further identifies one of the two termini of the line.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Arizona.

The motion was agreed to.

OHIO RIVER BRIDGE, STEUBENVILLE, OHIO

The bill (H. R. 14802) to legalize the existing railroad bridge across the Ohio River at Steubenville, Ohio, was read the first and second times by its title.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, the Senate on yesterday passed an identical Senate bill, S. 4614. I have just been informed that this Senate bill was passed by the House without amendment a short time ago; and as there is no further legislative step to take with reference to the matter, I therefore move that the House bill be indefinitely postponed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. CURTIS. I move that the Senate, as in open executive session, take a recess until 12 o'clock to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 3 o'clock and 45 minutes p. m.) the Senate, in open executive session, took a recess until to-morrow, Wednesday, January 9, 1929, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

TUESDAY, January 8, 1929

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O brooding Spirit of God, Thou who dost wear the earth as a flower upon Thy breast, hear our little prayer. While we realize the dark mystery of sin, we are so grateful for the bright message of pardoning and redeeming love; help us to translate into terms of human thought and express it in moral terms of daily conduct. We thank Thee that Thou hast placed eternity in hearts of men; and, Heavenly Father, in Thee only can we find complete satisfaction. Our intellects require Thee in the solution of the deepest problems of life. Thou alone can overtop all finite heights, for in Thee is gathered the fullness of all existence. Help us, direct us, and lead us to-day that our country may have the finest fruitage, our best thinking, and wisest working. Let Thy Holy Spirit be a witness to a Righteous King and moral government in the world. Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

NATIONAL PLAZA COMMISSION

The SPEAKER. Under authority of the bill S. 3171, providing for a Presidents' plaza and memorial in the city of Nashville, Tenn., to Andrew Jackson, James K. Polk, and Andrew Johnson, former Presidents of the United States, now a law, the Chair appoints as members of the commission known as the National Plaza Commission on the part of the House the gentleman from Tennessee, Mr. BYRNS, the gentleman from Tennessee, Mr. TAYLOR, and the gentleman from Tennessee, Mr. ESLICK.

SPEAKER PRO TEMPORE FOR TO-MORROW

The SPEAKER. The Chair designates the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON] to preside at the opening of the House to-morrow morning.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS IN THE APPENDIX OF THE DAILY RECORD

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, I rise to propound a parliamentary inquiry. I notice that when leave is granted to include an article as a part of remarks in the House it is usually printed in the Appendix, whereas in the other body it seems to be printed in the body of the RECORD. Does this correspond with the rules of the Joint Committee on Printing? My reason for making the inquiry is that yesterday one of the Members of the House asked to have printed an editorial written and signed by another Member of the House, and that it be included as a part of his remarks. It was put in the Appendix. I think properly so. But turning back I find that a similar request upon the part of a Member of another body is included in the body of the RECORD. What is the distinction in the privilege of the two bodies?

The SPEAKER It is a matter for each body to determine for itself; but the Chair has stated on a number of occasions that he thinks the proper distinction is this, that if a Member obtains the right to extend remarks which he is actually making by placing therein a document which he gets leave to print, that document is printed with those remarks in the main part of the RECORD. If, however, he asks leave to extend remarks not actually made by printing a certain document, that goes in the Appendix.

Mr. JONES. I appreciate that distinction and the reason for it, but those reasons do not seem to apply at the other end of the Capitol.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is not responsible for a great many things that occur at the other end of the Capitol.

Mr. JONES. In this particular instance the Member who made the request asked that it be printed as a part of his remarks.

The SPEAKER. As a part of the remarks that he was actually making on the floor?

Mr. JONES. No. He said, "I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks by incorporating this editorial as a part of my remarks."

The SPEAKER. That would go in the Appendix. If the gentleman is making remarks on the floor of the House and obtains leave to print any document which helps his argument or refers to matters he is discussing, the Chair thinks that properly becomes a part of his remarks in the main body of the RECORD; but if he rises and asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks and to incorporate therein a document, letter, or editorial—whatever it may be—that must be printed in the Appendix.

Mr. JONES. I appreciate the force of the Speaker's reasoning, and I am wondering why it does not apply at the other end of the Capitol. I think these articles should go in the Appendix, but I think they should go into the Appendix no matter which wing of the Capitol they come from.

BRIDGE ACROSS OHIO RIVER AT STEUBENVILLE, OHIO

Mr. BURTNESS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (S. 4616) to legalize the existing railroad bridge across the Ohio River at Steubenville, Ohio, and pass the same. An identical House bill passed the House yesterday. It was bill H. R. 14802, and is a bill legalizing an existing railroad bridge at Stuebenville, Ohio. The two bills are identical.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Dakota asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill S. 4616, and pass the same. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk reported the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

JAMES M. BECK ELECTION CASE

Mr. VINCENT of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I call up the report and resolution from Elections Committee No. 2 in the matter of the right of JAMES M. BECK to a seat in this House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan calls up a resolution which the Clerk will report.

Mr. VINCENT of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the resolution be reported in lieu of the report and resolution.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 283

Resolved, That JAMES M. BECK is entitled to a seat in the Seventieth Congress as a Member of the House of Representatives from the first congressional district of the State of Pennsylvania.

Mr. BROWNING. Mr. Speaker, I offer a substitute for the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee offers a substitute for the resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That JAMES M. BECK is not entitled to a seat in the Seventieth Congress as a Member of the House of Representatives from the first congressional district of the State of Pennsylvania.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. TILSON. Do I understand the gentleman from Michigan yielded to the gentleman from Tennessee for that purpose?

The SPEAKER. The Chair assumed that he yielded for that purpose.

Mr. TILSON. For the purpose simply of offering a substitute resolution?

Mr. BROWNING. Yes.

The SPEAKER. The Chair assumed that.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman from Michigan yield, is it the purpose of the gentleman to have the report printed in the RECORD?

Mr. VINCENT of Michigan. I would be glad to have it printed, and I ask unanimous consent——

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The report and the minority views?

Mr. VINCENT of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. It rather seemed to me in a case of this importance, it is well to have the official report of the committee and minority views printed in the RECORD.

Mr. VINCENT of Michigan. I will ask unanimous consent that the report of the committee and the views expressed by the minority Members be printed in the RECORD at this point.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent that the entire report, including the views of the minority, be printed in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[H. Rept. No. 975, 70th Cong., 1st sess.]

JAMES M. BECK ELECTION CASE

Mr. VINCENT of Michigan, from the Committee on Elections No. 2, submitted the following report, to accompany the JAMES M. BECK election case:

The Committee on Elections No. 2, having had under consideration the matter of the right of Mr. JAMES M. BECK to his seat as a Representative in the Seventieth Congress from the first congressional district of Pennsylvania, as submitted to said committee under House Resolution 9, after careful consideration of the same, respectfully submits this report to the House of Representatives.

THE QUESTION SUBMITTED

House Resolution 9 reads as follows:

"Whereas it is charged that JAMES M. BECK, a Representative elect to the Seventieth Congress from the State of Pennsylvania, is ineligible to a seat in the House of Representatives for the reason that he was not at the time of his election an inhabitant of the State of Pennsylvania in the sense of the provision of the Constitution of the United States (par. 5 of sec. 2, Art. I) prescribing the qualifications for Members thereof; and

"Whereas such charge is made through a Member of the House, and on his responsibility as such Member upon the basis, as he asserts, of records and papers evidencing such ineligibity:

"Resolved, That the right of JAMES M. BECK to a seat in the House of Representatives of the Seventieth Congress be referred to the Committee on Elections No. 2, which committee shall have power to send for persons and papers and examine witnesses on oath relative to the subject matter of the resolution."

It will be seen at once that the sole question involved is the naked constitutional question as to whether, under the facts, Mr. JAMES M. BECK at the time of his election to the House of Representatives was an inhabitant of Pennsylvania within the meaning of paragraph 2 of section 2, Article I, of the Constitution of the United States. This and no other question is involved. No charge of fraud nor any other wrongdoing is raised against the entire regularity and legality of Mr. BECK'S nomination nor election except the one question of his inhabitancy of Pennsylvania.

THE FACTS

Mr. JAMES M. BECK was born in Philadelphia, Pa., July 9, 1861. He was educated in the schools of that city. Later he attended the Moravian College at Bethlehem, Pa. He was admitted to the bar in Philadelphia in 1884, and resided in that city and practiced law there continuously until 1900. During this period he served one term as assistant United States attorney for the district in which Philadelphia is located, and also one term as United States attorney for the same district. In 1900 he was appointed by President McKinley Assistant Attorney General of the United States and came to Washington to discharge the duties of that office, but retained his residence in Philadelphia until 1903, when he resigned from this office. Upon his resignation he went to the city of New York to engage there in the practice of law. At that time he gave up his residence in Philadelphia and acquired a residence in New York City. He continued to reside in New York City until November, 1920. In the intervening period between 1903 and 1920 he acquired a summer home, not suitable for residence except as a summer place, at Sea Bright, N. J., which property he still owns.

In November, 1920, he sold his residence in New York City and came to Washington and purchased a house, which he has owned since, at 1624 Twenty-first Street NW. He purchased this home in Washington in anticipation of being appointed to a position in the Harding administration, and in 1921 he was appointed Solicitor General of the United States by President Harding. He held this position until 1925, when he resigned for the reason that his eyesight was being impaired by the burden of the work connected with that office.

Mr. BECK testified that when he went to New York to practice law in 1903 he did so for the purpose of acquiring a competence; that he never intended to make New York his permanent home; that it was always his intention to return to his native city of Philadelphia when such a competence had been acquired. And that when he sold his residence in New York in 1920 he ceased all residential connection with that city and State.

On April 30, 1925, he was appointed by the mayor of Philadelphia to represent the city of Philadelphia in securing the participation of foreign countries in the Sesquicentennial Exposition held in that city. Again the following year he was appointed as special commissioner of the exposition in foreign countries. On September 28, 1925, under a Federal statute which required that the advisory commission having the Sesquicentennial Exposition in charge should be composed of two members from each State, President Coolidge appointed Mr. BECK as one of the two members from Pennsylvania on the national advisory commission of that exposition.

On April 30, 1925, Mr. BECK made an address at a club function in Philadelphia in which he expressed his intention of resuming his permanent home in Philadelphia. In the spring of 1926 he conducted negotiations for the securing of an apartment in that city. An apartment at 1414–1416 Spruce Street, in the building known as the Richelieu Apartments, was selected and agreed upon. Before executing the lease therefor Mr. BECK went to Europe on matters connected with the Sesquicentennial Exposition. The apartment was held for him until his return. On July 6, 1926, he executed the lease for this apartment, in which it was provided that the rental should begin on June 1, 1926, the lease to be for one year with the privilege of renewal thereafter from year to year unless one of the parties thereto gave notice of discontinuance at least two months prior to the end of the current annual period. This was an unfurnished housekeeping apartment. The rental agreed upon was $110 per month, which the testimony showed Mr. BECK had paid continuously since the beginning of the lease. He immediately furnished the apartment with proper furniture and equipment.

It appeared that the testimony that Mr. BECK, with the exception of occasions when he was absent in Europe on business connected with the sesquicentennial, and except for summer periods spent in his Sea Bright summer home, has occupied this apartment one or more times each week. His sister, Miss Helen Beck, has also occupied the apartment for a considerable portion of the time it has been under lease. On numerous occasions when Mr. BECK was in Philadelphia, and his sister also was occupying the apartment while Mr. BECK made it his headquarters, it frequently occurred that he would spend the night near by at the Art Club of Philadelphia, of which he has been a member for years. The apartment consists of a living room, a bedroom, a kitchen, and a bathroom. Mr. BECK has retained his Washington house fully furnished and has occupied it whenever he desired during all of this period. He testified that he retained his Washington residence in the main because his professional work largely consisted of cases before the Supreme Court of the United States. He has a law office in the city of Washington, but not in partnership with any other attorney. His private business affairs are all conducted in Philadelphia, the Girard Trust Co. being his fiscal agent.

While Mr. BECK was a resident of New York he voted in that city. While he was Solicitor General of the United States he registered and voted from his summer home in Sea Bright, N. J. The last vote he cast there was in the presidential election of 1924. He testified that on account of his intention to reidentify himself with his native city of Philadelphia and to resume his citizenship in the State of Pennsylvania he refrained from voting elsewhere after 1924.

The law of Pennsylvania contains a requirement of a residence of one year in that State in order to qualify for registration for electoral purposes, except that in the case of one that has theretofore been a citizen of that State and, having resided elsewhere, has returned to the State of Pennsylvania, such residence requirement is reduced to six months. It is also required that in order to register in Pennsylvania one must have paid a tax of some sort; and if one has not paid a real estate or personal property tax, then one must pay a poll tax of 25 cents and hold the receipt at the time of registration. Mr. BECK paid this poll tax in September, 1927, and offered himself for registration as a voter in September, 1927, and was registered. He voted in the primaries in the city of Philadelphia on September 20, 1927. He was assessed for a personal-property tax on a valuation of $20,000 in Philadelphia on October 3, 1927. This tax did not become payable until after the expiration of the year 1927.

After the primary of September 20, 1927, the Representative elect from the first congressional district of Pennsylvania, Mr. Hazlett, resigned, and to fill the vacancy so caused the proper Republican authorities nominated Mr. BECK for Representative in Congress on the Republican ticket. The Democratic Party nominated Mr. J. P. Mulrenan. At the election on November 6, 1927, Mr. BECK was elected by a majority of approximately 60,000.

As tending to prove his constant intention to reidentify himself with Philadelphia and to resume his citizenship thereof, Mr. BECK testified concerning his membership in many social and civic institutions of that city, most of these memberships having existed for many years. Among these were the Fairmount Park Art Association, of which he had been president and is now vice president and general counsel—its purpose is the improvement of the city by the erection of works of art therein; the Philadelphia Commission, having a somewhat similar purpose as that of the foregoing association; the City Parks Association, having a somewhat similar purpose; the American Philosophical Society; the Art Club; the Legal Club; the Shakespeare Society; the Mahogany Tree Club; the Franklin Inn Club; the General Alumni Society of the University of Pennsylvania; the New England Society of Pennsylvania; the Historical Society of Pennsylvania; the Five O'Clock Club; the Orpheus Club; the Friendly Sons of St. Patrick. It is proper to say in connection with the memberships in these clubs and associations that two of the clubs carry a separate roster for resident and nonresident memberships. Mr. BECK stated that he did not personally draw the checks for membership dues in these organizations but that this matter was taken care of by his secretary. In the late fall of 1927 his attention was called to the question as to whether he ought not to change from the nonresident classification to resident classification in the Art Club. This he attended to as soon as the matter was brought to his notice.

In the case of the other club having the two classifications, he was carried as a nonresident member.

It is proper to add also that the house in Washington is an attractive, commodious, well-furnished house, in which there is much more room and much more valuable furniture and equipment than in the Philadelphia apartment, and that in the matter of number of days actually spent by Mr. BECK in these two places of abode since the acquiring of the Philadelphia apartment, more days have been spent in the Washington house than in the Philadelphia apartment. It further appeared that Mr. BECK had on occasions when he was a guest in hotels registered from Washington, and that his automobiles bear license plates provided by the District of Columbia.

THE CONSTITUTIONAL PROVISION

Paragraph 2 of section 2, Article I of the Constitution, provides as follows:

"No person shall be a Representative who shall not have attained the age of 25 years and been seven years a citizen of the United States and who shall not, when elected, be an inhabitant of that State in which he shall be chosen."

THE PROCEEDINGS IN THE CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION

To determine whether the facts applicable to the case of Mr. BECK place him within the meaning of the framers of the Constitution in their use of the word "inhabitant," it is of the greatest importance to consider the debate which occurred at the time this provision was adopted. This particular provision of the Constitution was considered on Wednesday, August 8, 1787, and as it came before the convention the provisions were the same as now except that citizenship of the United States for a period of three years was required, and it was also required that the Representative should be a "resident" of the State from which he should be chosen. The following is the entire debate contained in the Madison Papers on this paragraph of the Constitution:

"Col. Mason was for opening a wide door for emigrants; but did not chuse to let foreigners and adventurers make laws for us & govern us. Citizenship for three years was not enough for ensuring that local knowledge which ought to be possessed by the Representative. This was the principal ground of his objection to so short a term. It might also happen that a rich foreign Nation, for example Great Britain, might send over her tools who might bribe their way into the Legislature for insidious purposes. He moved that 'seven' years instead of 'three' be inserted.

"Mr. Govr. Morris seconded the motion, & on the question, All the States agreed to it except Connecticut.

"Mr. Sherman moved to strike out the word 'resident' and insert 'inhabitant,' as less liable to misconstruction.

"Mr. Madison seconded the motion. Both were vague, but the latter least so in common acceptation, and would not exclude persons absent occasionally for a considerable time on public or private business. Great disputes had been raised in Virginia, concerning the meaning of residence as a qualification of Representatives which were determined more according to the affection or dislike to the man in question, than to any fixt interpretation of the word.

"Mr. Wilson preferred 'inhabitant.'

"Mr. Govr. Morris was opposed to both and for requiring nothing more than a freehold. He quoted great disputes in New York occasioned by these terms, which were decided by the arbitrary will be of the majority. Such a regulation is not necessary. People rarely chuse a nonresident. It is improper as in the 1st branch, the people at large, not the states, are represented.

"Mr. Rutlidge urged & moved that a residence of 7 years should be required in the State wherein the Member should be elected. An emigrant from New England to South Carolina or Georgia would know little of its affairs and could not be supposed to acquire a thorough knowledge in less time.

"Mr. Read reminded him that we were now forming a National Government and such a regulation would correspond little with the idea that we were one people.

"Mr. Wilson enforced the same consideration.

"Mr. Madison suggested the case of new states in the West, which could have perhaps no representation on that plan.

"Mr. MERCER. Such a regulation would present a greater alienship among the States than existed under the old federal system. It would interweave local prejudices and State distinctions in the very Constitution which is meant to cure them. He mentioned instances of violent disputes raised in Maryland concerning the term 'residence.'

"Mr. Elseworth thought seven years of residence was by far too long a term: but that some fixt term of previous residence would be proper. He thought one year would be sufficient, but seemed to have no objection to three years.

"Mr. Dickinson proposed that it should read 'inhabitant actually resident for — year.' This would render the meaning less indeterminate.

"Mr. WILSON. If a short term should be inserted in the blank, so strict an expression might be construed to exclude the members of the Legislature, who could not be said to be actual residents in their States whilst at the Seat of the General Government.

"Mr. MERCER. It would certainly exclude men, who had once been inhabitants, and returning from residence elsewhere to resettle in their original State; although a want of the necessary knowledge could not in such case be presumed.

"Mr. Mason thought 7 years too long, but would never agree to part with the principle. It is a valuable principle. He thought it a defect in the plan that the Representatives would be too few to bring with them all the local knowledge necessary. If residence be not required, rich men of neighbouring States, may employ with success the means of corruption in some particular district and thereby get into the public Councils after having failed in their own State. This is the practice in the boroughs of England.

"On the question for postponing in order to consider Mr. Dickinsons motion:

"New Hampshire, no. Massachusetts, no. Connecticut, no. New Jersey, no. Pennsylvania, no. Delaware, no. Maryland, ay. Virginia, no. North Carolina, No. South Carolina, ay. Georgia, ay.

"On the question for inserting 'inhabitant' in place of 'resident'—agreed to nem. con.

"Mr. Elseworth & Col. Mason moved to insert 'one year' for previous inhabitancy.

"Mr. Williamson liked the Report as it stood. He thought 'resident' a good enough term. He was against requiring any period of previous residence. New residents if elected will be most zealous to conform to the will of their constituents, as their conduct will be watched with a more jealous eye.

"Mr. Butler and Mr. Rutlidge moved 'three years' instead of 'one year' for previous inhabitancy.

"On the question for 3 years:

"New Hampshire, no. Massachusetts, no. Connecticut, no. New Jersey, ay. Pennsylvania, no. Delaware, no. Maryland, no. Virginia, no. North Carolina, ay. South Carolina, ay. Georgia, ay.

"On the question for '1 year':

"New Hampshire, no. Massachusetts, no. Connecticut, no. New Jersey, ay. Pennsylvania, no. Delaware, no. Maryland, divided. Virginia, no. North Carolina, ay. South Carolina, ay. Georgia, ay."

It is evident that in this debate the framers of the Constitution were seeking for a nontechnical word, the main purpose of which would be to insure that the Representative, when chosen, from a particular State should have adequate knowledge of its local affairs and conditions. Mr. Madison, Mr. Wilson, and Mr. Mercer all emphasized that it was not desired to exclude men who had once been inhabitants of a State and who were returning to resettle in their original State, or men who were absent for considerable periods on public or private business. The convention by vote deliberately declined to fix any time limit during which inhabitancy must persist. To get clearly in mind the thought which the word "inhabitant" held in the minds of the framers of the Constitution, it is well to recall that in the days of the Colonies the people who constituted the body politic of a colony were quite generally described in the charters and other public documents connected with the governments of the Colonies as being "subjects" of Great Britain and "inhabitants" of the colony in which they were members of the body politic.

A number of examples of this are recited in the volume of law arguments taken in the hearings before this committee, beginning on page 38. To these men an "inhabitant" was one who had an abode within a colony and was recognized and identified as one who was a member of the body politic thereof. The fact that he might absent himself physically from the colony for a very considerable period of time did not militate against the recognition of him as an inhabitant of such a colony, and this remained true after the colonies had achieved their independence and had become independent States. Thus, though George Washington was for the greater part of 16 years absent from Mount Vernon and Benjamin Franklin was absent for years from Pennsylvania, no one would have considered there was any cloud on their title as inhabitants, respectively, of the States of Virginia and Pennsylvania. In those early times it was the uncommon rather than the common thing that a man should have more than one place of abode. In these modern times it is quite common that men have two or more places of abode to which they may repair according to the season of the year, according to their business convenience, or according to the public duties which they may be called upon to discharge. This is true of many Members of each House of the Congress to-day, but the principle has not changed. Admittedly a man can have but one inhabitancy within the meaning of the Constitution at a given time. Where this may be is a mixed question of intent and of fact.

To be an inhabitant within the Constitution, it seems clear that one must have, first, as a matter of fact, a place of abode, and second, that this place of abode be intended by him as his headquarters; the place where his civic duties and responsibilities center; the place from which he will exercise his civic rights. We think that a fair reading of the debate on this paragraph of the Constitution discloses that it was not intended that the word "inhabitant" should be regarded in a captious, technical sense. Can it be that the fathers intended that to determine whether one was an inhabitant of a particular place that the number of days which he actually spent there in a given period should be counted and his absences balanced against the periods of his physical presence? Can it be that the fathers intended that the tenure of his holding of a particular abode, whether it be by fee-simple title or by leasehold, should govern the question as to whether it was the place of inhabitance? We feel positive that such a construction would in no sense carry out the meaning which the framers of the Constitution regarded as contained in this word. Further, such a technical attempt at construction would result in the very confusion which the debate showed the framers hoped to avoid by the rejection of the word "resident." We think that a fair interpretation of the letter and the spirit of this paragraph with respect to the word "inhabitant" is that the framers intended that for a person to bring himself within the scope of its meaning he must have and occupy a place of abode within the particular State in which he claims inhabitancy, and that he must have openly and avowedly by act and by word subjected himself to the duties and responsibilities of a member of the body politic of that particular State.

That Mr. BECK has such an abode in the State of Pennsylvania can not be questioned. That he had obtained it a year and a half before his election to Congress is unquestioned. That he had occupied it according to his convenience one or more times a week during that period was testified to by Mr. BECK, and certainly was not disproved by any other evidence. It is true that during a part of the period under discussion he was absent from the country, but then he was absent on business connected with the city of Philadelphia, and certainly such absence ought not to be counted against his being an inhabitant, the absence being on public business connected with the very city in which he claims to be an inhabitant. It is true, too, that he spent a short portion of time in the summer at his place at Sea Bright, N. J., but it will be an unusual conclusion if it is held that for a man to absent himself from the place of his inhabitance in order to live for a time at his summer place raises a cloud upon the legal continuance of his inhabitancy. So much for the fact as to a place of abode in Pennsylvania.

As to Mr. BECK'S intention, let it be said that he testified before the committee, fully and frankly, as to all the circumstances and facts which were asked of him; as fully and frankly disclosing those facts which seemed, possibly, to militate against him as to any. He solemnly testified under oath before the committee that when he went to New York to live in 1903 he then had the intention some time to return to Philadelphia, his native city, and resume his citizenship in that city and reidentify himself with its affairs. Hence, he kept his memberships in all the civic associations in which he had acquired membership before his leaving. He testified that this had always been his intention during all of the time he was away from Philadelphia.

He testified that when he left New York in 1920 and came to Washington to take up the duties of Solicitor General of the United States that he had acquired a competence, and that it was his intention, if found acceptable to the public, to devote the remainder of his life to public service; and that when his duties were ended as Solicitor General he began negotiating for a place in Philadelphia so that he might carry out the intention he had held all those years to return and reidentify himself with Philadelphia and with its public affairs. He testified that at that time he entertained the hope that it might occur that he could have a seat in Congress from that city.

In carrying out his desire to give himself to the public service of that city, he gave very much of his time to the Sesquicentennial Exposition, accepting a commission from the mayor of the city and from the President of the United States to a high position connected with that exposition, that he traveled abroad to foreign countries to engage their interest and cooperation in making the exposition a success, giving his time and efforts thereto without any remuneration.

He solemnly testified under oath that since June 1, 1926, his intention has been to be a resident of the State of Pennsylvania and in the constitutional sense to be an inhabitant of that State, and to subject himself to all the duties as well as to enjoy the privileges of that status.

There is no testimony and no fact which would warrant the committee in making a finding that this statement is not entirely true.

Further than this, Mr. BECK is now and was at the time of his election a "legal resident" of Pennsylvania. We do not think that this can be disputed. He had a habitation there and at the expiration of more than the required time under the constitution of Pennsylvania he presented himself for registration, asserted his intention to be a resident of Pennsylvania, and was registered as a voter. By that act he subjected himself conclusively to all the duties of a resident of Pennsylvania. Thereupon he became subject, among other things, to personal taxation within the State of Pennsylvania, subject to jury duty there, and, if he died, conclusively subject to the inheritance tax laws of that State. In other words, he subjected himself to all the duties that fall upon a resident of that State and could not be heard to claim that he was not a resident there.

Mr. BECK is a "citizen" of Pennsylvania. We do not think this can be disputed. Born in that State, after having left it, he has returned and maintained a legal residence more than sufficiently long to satisfy the constitutional provision of that State as to citizenship therein.

Mr. BECK is a legal elector in the State of Pennsylvania. We do not think this can be disputed. Having maintained a legal residence in that State more than sufficiently long to qualify him for the electoral privileges, he attended to the formalities thereof, paid the poll tax required, offered himself to the registration board for registration, was registered as a voter without challenge, and thereafter and before his election performed the privilege of voting in an election without challenge.

We do not think that the framers of the Constitution intended by the use of the word "inhabitant" that the anomalous situation might ever arise that a man should be a citizen, a legal resident, and a voter within a given State and yet be constitutionally an inhabitant elsewhere. If any such conclusion could be reached we might have the peculiar result in this country of a man being a resident, a citizen, and a voter in a given State, and yet within the constitutional sense barred from the right of representing a district in that State in Congress, but having the right to represent a district in another State in Congress. No such interpretation can fairly be read into this provision. We think that Mr. BECK, having legally subjected himself to the duties and responsibilities of a citizen and an inhabitant of Pennsylvania, having maintained a habitation there, and having occupied the same regularly, though not continuously, is also entitled to the rights of a citizen and an inhabitant of Pennsylvania. We think that such a finding is entirely within the meaning, the spirit, and the letter of the Constitution.

THE PRECEDENTS

We think that a proper interpretation of the facts in the early case of Philip B. Key in the Tenth Congress would be controlling in the present case. Mr. Key was a native of Maryland and a citizen and resident of that State at the time of the adoption of the Constitution. He was never a citizen or resident of any other of the United States. But in 1801 he removed from Maryland to his house in Georgetown, D. C., where he continued to reside until 1806. During that period he had no other habitation. In 1805, however, he had purchased land in Maryland and had contracted for the erection of a summer home thereon, intended for his own use. On September 18, 1806, he removed with his family into this summer home, which was not yet entirely completed. On October 6, 1806, just 18 days later, an election occurred in which Mr. Key was elected to a seat in the House of Representatives. He had left his house in Georgetown, D. C., fully furnished. On October 20, 1806, he removed with his family and household to his house in the District of Columbia again, where he lived until July, 1807, in which month he returned to his Maryland house and lived in it until October 23, 1807. On this latter date he returned to his house in the District of Columbia to attend to his duties in Congress. During the five years that he had no habitation in Maryland and during which his sole habitation was in the District of Columbia he continued to practice law in Maryland and had not practiced in the District of Columbia. But he had in January, February, and March, 1806, declared that he intended to reside in Maryland and that he bought the land with that intention. It was admitted that the House which he built in Maryland and which he occupied only 18 days before the election was fitted only for a summer residence and was much inferior to the house in the District of Columbia, and that the latter was left practically with its furnishing complete whenever the family went to Maryland. This case will be found reported on page 417 of the first volume of Hinds' Precedents.

In the argument before the committee an attempt was made to distinguish this case from the Beck case in two particulars: First, that Mr. Key when he left Maryland did not establish a residence in any other State but only in the District of Columbia, while Mr. BECK, when he left Pennsylvania, established a residence first in New York and later in the District of Columbia. We are unable to see that this creates any distinction between the two cases as a matter of legal contemplation. Mr. Key utterly ceased to be an inhabitant of Maryland in 1801. Mr. BECK as fully ceased to be an inhabitant of Pennsylvania in 1903. We fail to see wherein any distinction as a matter of law can arise on the question of inhabitancy due to the fact that one moved into the District of Columbia and the other moved into the State of New York. In each case the habitation in the native State completely ceased. In both cases, if it were revived, the revival occurred by proceeding from the District of Columbia back to the native State. In the case of Mr. Key the new inhabitancy of the State of Maryland existed for 18 days prior to the election. In the case of Mr. BECK it existed for a year and a half prior to the election.

The other point of distinction that was attempted to be raised to void the effect of the Key case on the present issue in the argument was that in the Key case Mr. Key owned outright the house in Maryland to which he moved 18 days prior to his election, while Mr. BECK'S is a leasehold. We can not conceive that there is any merit in this attempted distinction. It is as common in this country for a man's habitation to be held by lease as it is by free ownership. It is the intent under which he occupies it which is the controlling feature. The House of Representatives held that Mr. Key was, within the constitutional sense, an inhabitant of Maryland and entitled to his seat in the House of Representatives.

A case which was relied upon in the argument to uphold the exclusion of Mr. BECK from his seat was the case of John Bailey, elected from Massachusetts to the Eighteenth Congress, reported on page 419 of the first volume of Hinds' Precedents. The facts in that case were as follows:

On October 1, 1817, Mr. Bailey, who was then a resident of Massachusetts, was appointed a clerk in the Department of State. He immediately repaired to Washington and entered upon the duties of his position and continued to hold the position and reside in Washington until October 21, 1823, when he resigned the appointment. It did not appear that he exercised any of the rights of citizenship in the District, and there was evidence to show that he considered Massachusetts as his home, and his residence in Washington only temporary. It was shown that Mr. Bailey resided in Washington in a public hotel with occasional absences on visits to Massachusetts until his marriage in Washington, at which time he took up his residence with his wife's mother. He never exercised the right of suffrage in Massachusetts after leaving there for Washington.

The election at which Mr. Bailey was chosen as a Representative was held September 8, 1823, at which time he was actually residing in Washington in his capacity as clerk in the State Department. This case was debated in the House for seven days, and, of course, many things were said, but the facts in it are what seem important in its use as a precedent. Mr. Bailey had no abode in Massachusetts. Before he came to Washington he lived with his parents in their house. He had none of his own, either leased or owned. In support of the committee it was stated "had he left a dwelling house in Massachusetts in which his family resided a part of the year; had he left there any of the insignia of a household establishment, there would be indication that his domicile in Massachusetts had not been abandoned."

We think that the Bailey case is clearly distinguishable from the Beck case in that Mr. Bailey had no habitation, no place of abode, under his control in Massachusetts at any time after he accepted the appointment in Washington. The very report of the committee in the Bailey case shows that had he maintained any place of abode or insignia of domestic establishment to which he had repaired from time to time, the holding of the committee would have been otherwise.

No doubt it would do violence to words to hold that a man was an inhabitant of a place where he had no habitation. The House of Representatives held that Mr. Bailey was not entitled to his seat.

The case of Nathan B. Scott, elected a Senator from the State of West Virginia in 1899, was contested on the ground that he was not an inhabitant of the State of West Virginia at the time he was elected. Mr. Scott resided at Wheeling, W. Va., until January 1, 1898, when he was appointed Commissioner of Internal Revenue, at which time he came to Washington to discharge the duties of that office. His intention was to retain his residence and habitation at Wheeling, W. Va., and in carrying out that intention he voted in the election held November 8, 1898, at Wheeling, W. Va. He had no intention to change his domicile to Washington from Wheeling and he claimed to be an inhabitant of Wheeling, W. Va. The committee found that Mr. Scott was an inhabitant of Wheeling, W. Va., at the time he was elected to the Senate of the United States.

In the Bailey case, Mr. Bailey did not exercise the rights of citizenship in the State of Massachusetts, nor did he vote in the State of Massachusetts. In the Scott case, Senator Scott did, and the Senate found that he was an inhabitant of the State of West Virginia.

The committee desires to direct attention to the language in the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Shelton v. Tiffin (6 Howard, 163, 185). The Federal courts had no jurisdiction in this controversy, unless within the meaning of section 2 of Article III of the Constitution of the United States, the parties thereto were citizens of different States. Hence, this question being raised, its solution was necessary to the decision of the court. In this case, the Supreme Court uses the following language:

"On a change of domicile from one State to another, citizenship may depend upon the intention of the individual. But this intention may be shown more satisfactorily by acts than declarations. An exercise of the right of suffrage is conclusive on the subject; but acquiring a right of suffrage, accompanied by acts which show a permanent location, unexplained, may be sufficient."

It is true that a holding of even the Supreme Court of the United States is not binding on the House of Representatives in the question at bar, since this question is committed by the Constitution solely to the House of Representatives, but we think the opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States ought to be regarded with the highest respect and should be very persuasive in deciding a similar question. It will be remembered in this connection that Mr. Beck registered as a voter and exercised the right of suffrage in Philadelphia in the month of September, prior to the November in which he was elected to Congress.

It is true that in the many court decisions that have been rendered in various courts of the States, under different legal situations, many contradictory definitions of the words "inhabitant" and "resident" may be found. We are impressed, however, with the conviction that the framers of the Constitution were seeking to use the word "inhabitant" in the plain, nontechnical sense in which it had been understood as explained above up to the time of the framing of the Constitution, and that their purpose was to require those who represented the several States in the House of Representatives to be identified with the local interests of those States by having a habitation therein and being in addition a member of the body politic of the particular State from whence they came to the House.

It was argued before the committee that such a construction would lead to the existence of "rotten boroughs" in the United States as once existed in England. We think this argument misapprehends what the "rotten boroughs" were. It will be remembered that the "rotten boroughs" consisted of small communities with few inhabitants, which were given representation in Parliament out of all proportion to the population of other areas and large centers. In other words, the "rotten boroughs" situation in England resulted in insufficient representation for large bodies of the population as compared to many small communities. We call attention to the fact that if a man, because he has business in the District of Columbia and arranges a place of abode there so that he may conveniently care for such business when necessity occasions it, whether it be public or private, is to be denied for that reason the right to have a habitation within one of the States, to acquire citizenship there, to be an elector there, to take his part in exercising the duties and responsibilities of citizenship, it will result in a much closer approximation to the "rotten borough" situation which has been described and condemned.

After all, we must rely upon the integrity, the patriotism, and the good common sense of the electors in the various districts with respect to the choice of a fit membership in the House of Representatives. This is a part of the very genius of representative government. And we do not think that it is proper to seek for strained and captious interpretations of this paragraph of the Constitution to find reasons for rejecting men who have been chosen through the deliberate will of their constituents as indicated at the polls. We believe that every word of the Constitution should be upheld, but we do not think that men who have been chosen to represent a district should be excluded unless their case presents a clear violation of the constitutional provision. We are convinced that such is not the case in the matter now before us. We believe that Mr. BECK is clearly entitled to his seat.

For the above reasons, the committee recommends the adoption of the following resolution:

"Resolved, That JAMES M. BECK is entitled to his seat in the Seventieth Congress as a Member of the House of Representatives from the first congressional district of the State of Pennsylvania."

MINORITY VIEWS

JAMES M. BECK CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE

We, the minority, regret to find ourselves in disagreement with a majority of the committee who report that Mr. JAMES M. BECK is entitled to a seat in the House of Representatives from the first Pennsylvania district. If the question involved were not one of vast importance, in our opinion, we would not interpose our opposition; for there could be no personal objection to Mr. BECK as a Member. Neither is there any political significance that could attach to the challenge of his right to sit, as anyone from that district at this time undoubtedly would be of his political faith. And we recognize fully that the renown of Mr. BECK as a constitutional lawyer and a man of high intellectual attainments necessarily is persuasive with the committee.

But the issue is one which goes to the vitals of the National Constitution. Mr. BECK in his opening statement expressly recognized that the question is not free from difficulty. The question arises as to his qualification under Article I, section 2, of the Constitution, wherein it says:

"No person shall be a Representative who shall not have attained to the age of 25 years, and been 7 years a citizen of the United States, and who shall not, when elected, be an inhabitant of the State in which he shall be chosen."

Our conviction is that he was not an inhabitant of the State of Pennsylvania in November, 1927, when chosen.

Mr. BECK was born in Philadelphia July 9, 1861, and had his home in that State until 1900, when he came to Washington, D. C., as Assistant Attorney General. In 1903 he resigned his position in Washington, gave up his residence in Philadelphia, and moved to New York to practice law with a view to securing a competence. He owned one or more homes in New York where he lived and voted and practiced law until November, 1920. At that time he sold his New York home and purchased a commodious residence on Twenty-first Street NW.,

Washington, D. C., to which he immediately moved his family, his extensive personal library, his art treasures, and all his personal belongings he holds most dear.

In June, 1921, Mr. BECK was appointed Solicitor General of the United States by President Harding, and held that position until June, 1925, when he resigned on account of his eyes failing. He immediately established a law office in the Southern Building, Washington, and specialized in United States Supreme Court practice, which law office he still maintains. He also resumed his connection with his old law firm in New York. He does not practice law in Pennsylvania, and has not since 1900.

For several years he has owned and used a summer home in Sea Bright, N. J., on the ocean front. After moving from New York in 1920 he established a voting status at his summer home and he and his wife voted there in the 1924 presidential election by mail. In November, 1927, when chosen he sustained the same relation as to voting status in New Jersey which he did in 1924 and does at the present time, except expressing an intention, which was not carried out, to transfer it to Pennsylvania. His residential connection there is exactly the same, having used that residence for himself and family the last summer months. So far as the New Jersey authorities are concerned, no act of Mr. BECK has shown withdrawal of claims for voting privileges in that State.

In the early spring of 1926 he went to Philadelphia, and with Mr. Greenfield, a real-estate man who is also prominent politically, looked at some two or three apartments in the first congressional district with a view to retaining one for the specific purpose of running for Congress from that district. Mr. BECK states that he had two purposes in view by this. One was to again establish a status in Philadelphia as one of its people. The other was to run for Congress from that district. As to the latter purpose he said:

"The seat in Congress was then a possibility undoubtedly, and I would not want to say, and could not say truthfully, that it had nothing to do with the renting of the apartment." (Rec. p. 58.)

Again he states:

"The apartment was selected in full anticipation of the fact that I might run for Congress. My point is that my taking any habitation in Philadelphia had as its dominant purpose the desire to be reidentified with the political life of Philadelphia, quite irrespective of whether I ran for Congress or not. But the selection of this locality had in mind the possibility of my going to Congress; and it also had in mind that it was very accessible to the main thoroughfare of Philadelphia, and right around the corner from my club." (Rec. p. 61.)

Mr. VARE, the then sitting Member from the first Pennsylvania district, was at that time a candidate for nomination to the United States Senate.

But no apartment was then agreed on, and Mr. BECK went to Europe on a business mission in April, 1926. He returned early in June. On the 6th of July following it seemed that Mr. Greenfield had put in order a 2-room apartment at 1414 Spruce Street, and Mr. BECK then leased it as of date June 1, 1926. This was a yearly renewable lease, unless either party exercised the option of giving a legal notice of its termination. The apartment was then furnished by Mr. BECK, and he still holds it and pays rent on it.

His unmarried sister, Miss Helen Beck, has occupied this apartment continuously for a year; and while she is in it he goes to the Art Club to sleep when in Philadelphia rather than incommode her. The apartment is equipped with a kitchenette, but Mr. BECK has never eaten a meal there. It has one bedroom.

Mr. BECK states that he is in Philadelphia most every week; that he frequently goes to New York on business, and stops over there to break the trip. He was carried as a nonresident member of several clubs in Philadelphia at the time of election and until January last. In none of them was he listed as a resident member.

The janitor of this apartment house, who admits he is entirely unreliable, when approached on the premises, and without notice of the purpose of the inquiry, first said he had only seen Mr. BECK there three times in the 18 months. When placed on the stand he finally estimated that he had known of him being there fifteen or twenty times.

On page 66 of the record, Mr. BECK gives the status of his family as follows:

"Mr. KENT. Now, your family consists of whom?

"Mr. BECK. My wife and myself. I have two children.

"Mr. KENT. Where are they?

"Mr. BECK. My daughter is the wife of the United States consul at Geneva; my son has been in London ever since he was in the Army in France. But neither of my children live with Mrs. Beck and myself. We live alone."

And there can be no question but that Mr. BECK and his wife "live alone" in Washington, D. C., and have lived here since November, 1920, have had this as their domicile, their abode, their habitation. Mr. BECK always registers from Washington when he goes to hotels, has his merchandise for personal comfort sent to him here, has his automobiles for every use registered here; and at no time has he treated the small two-room apartment in Philadelphia as a real, bona fide habitation for any purpose except a gesture at compliance with the constitutional requirement for an inhabitant.

So his claim to inhabitancy is based on the rental of this apartment, which is in reality a place for his unmarried sister to live, with occasional visits to the city of Philadelphia by him when he would stop largely at the Art Club or a hotel; his testimony of intent to return; that he transacts his private affairs in Pennsylvania; and that he attempted to qualify and did vote there in a primary in that State in 1927.

We can not ascribe to the doctrine that intention is the controlling part of inhabitancy. Mr. BECK quotes approvingly a letter relating to his speech in Philadelphia, on April 30, 1925, to the effect that he was "then in a position to take a permanent home again in Philadelphia, where, among your old friends and your books, you would indulge yourself for the balance of your life." Of this Mr. BECK said, "that is just what I said in substance." It would be a strange perversion of every rule to accept even undisputed intentions, shown by declarations, in the face of a state of facts, such as we have in this case, to prove inhabitancy. In truth, Mr. BECK never took a permanent home again in Philadelphia. Had he done so, and moved his family and his books and household there before election, as his expressed intention was, no question would now be made as to his eligibility. Intention, in a case of this kind, is a deduction or conclusion of law founded on fact. We must determine from the facts whether inhabitancy exists. It certainly can not be shifted or designated at the whim or pleasure of the individual affected.

Granting that he had the intention to return, this was outweighed by his desire to inhabit Washington, to practice law here, to have advantage of proximity to the United States Supreme Court, to all Federal activities, to retain all his books, works of art, home, servants, automobiles, mental endeavors, entirely without the borders of the State of Pennsylvania.

As to the transaction of his private affairs in Pennsylvania, it is a fair inference from the proof that he has $20,000 in securities or some other form of property in that State, as he submitted to an assessment in that sum. But he pays taxes in New Jersey on both real and personal property, pays his income tax from Washington, as well as a realty tax here, no doubt on more property value than that for which he is assessed in Pennsylvania. We can find no burdens of citizenship carried by Mr. BECK in that State which he does not bear both in New Jersey and the District of Columbia, except 25 cents paid in September last for an occupational tax.

It is contended that a mere political status meets this requirement of the Constitution. If a political status could be counted the sole qualification for holding this office under the Federal Constitution, a citizen just naturalized and having acquired a voting privilege in his State could sit in Congress, although the Constitution says he must have "been seven years a citizen of the United States"; and likewise, if the citizen is 21 years of age and can vote in his State he could come to Congress in the face of the constitutional provision that "no person shall be a Representative who shall not have attained the age of 25 years." The burdens of citizenship are definitely placed on these two classes who are forbidden to hold a seat in Congress, even though their constituents should choose them unanimously. There is no more discrimination against one who has met the requirements for voting in a State, but who is not an inhabitant of that State within the meaning of our National Constitution, than there is against these others so limited in this privilege.

A mere voting privilege is granted by each separate State in its own way. If a voter can satisfy the requirements of a State law, he can exercise the privilege of franchise. But compliance with the requirements of the Federal Constitution in qualifying for membership in this House is entirely independent of State regulation. A voting status can not be the measure of inhabitancy. If it had been thus intended, the Federal Constitution would have remained silent and thereby left the matter to the separate States. This would amount to the same thing as expressly telling each of the States to fix this qualification, when they would leave that right in the absence of any expression by the Federal Constitution.

One of the conclusive reasons that they regarded a "citizen" and an "inhabitant" as entirely different designations is that they used both in this same clause, this same sentence, for separate and distinct qualifications for membership. No trivial matter of verbiage or curious distinction is necessary to a sensible meaning of this term as used by great men.

The word was substituted for "resident," and the reason clearly given by the great Madison was to allow a temporary absence from a true domicile, not to place it on a casual presence in a temporary domicile.

Mr. BECK was not a qualified elector of the State of Pennsylvania at the time he voted in the primary of September, 1927, nor at the time of his election to Congress. The constitution of that State requires that an elector must be a "resident" of the State for 6 months next before voting in his case, and 12 months for one who has never before been a citizen of Pennsylvania. And the courts of that State have repeatedly and uniformly held, as in Fry's election case (71 Pa. 302, p. 305):

"When the constitution declares that the elector must be a resident of the State for one year it refers beyond question to the State as his home or domicile, and not as the place of a temporary sojourn." * * *

"These extracts will enable us to understand more clearly the term 'residence,' as denoting that home or domicile which the third article of the constitution applies to the freeman of the Commonwealth. It means that place where the elector makes his permanent or true home, his principal place of business, and his family residence, if he have one; where he intends to remain indefinitely; and without a present intention to depart; when he leaves it he intends to return to it, and after his return he deems himself at home."

It can not be reasonably contended that Mr. BECK had his home or domicile in Pennsylvania at that time. It was here in Washington, where it has been since November, 1920, the place where he has his family life, where he comes when he is sick, his true home, the only establishment he has had which resembles a home or permanent domicile, where he keeps his five servants, two automobiles, and the only place he keeps these or any other semblances of home life to comport with his accustomed comfort.

In addition to this, he did not procure his occupational tax receipt on the 9th of September, 1927, legally. This is not meant in the sense of imputing bad faith to Mr. BECK, but the law requires specifically that this must be purchased from the office of the receiver of taxes in person or from a deputy at the place of registration on any of the registration days provided by law; and the only exception to this is when a written and signed order is given by the elector to a person to purchase same for him. This was not done. The receipt was delivered to Mr. BECK in the office of Mr. VARE, not on registration day, not at the place for registration, not in the office of the receiver of taxes, and after being procured by some person with no written authority to purchase same. It is expressly made unlawful in Pennsylvania for any person to vote or attempt to vote upon a tax receipt so obtained in violation of this law. It appears from the testimony by Harry W. Keely, receiver of taxes for the city of Philadelphia, Mr. BECK, and others, that this receipt was not issued in accordance with law and could not be used lawfully. It was only 11 days old when used by him, whereas the law directs that it must have been purchased 30 days before the election in which it is used. But the disqualification for voting which is in no way technical is that of failure to comply with the requirements of a "resident," since his real home, his actual established home, is elsewhere than in Pennsylvania, where at best he only has a place of temporary sojourn.

But if Mr. BECK had been qualified and had legally voted in all Pennsylvania elections, this would in no way be conclusive of inhabitancy. In the Virginia case of Bayley v. Barbour (47th Cong., Hinds, vol. 1, p. 425) the House held as follows:

"In answer to this position, without deeming it necessary upon the facts of this case to enter into the constitutional signification of inhabitancy, it is only necessary to say that the right to vote is not an essential of inhabitancy within the meaning of the Constitution, which is apparent from an inspection of the Constitution itself. In Article I, section 2, the electors of Members of Congress 'shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State legislature,' but in the succeeding section, providing for the qualifications of Members of Congress, it is provided that he shall be an inhabitant of the State in which he is chosen. It is reasonable to conclude that if the elective franchise was an essential the word 'elector' would have been used in both sections, and that it is not used is conclusive that it was not so intended."

And if a voting status "is not an essential of inhabitancy within the meaning of the Constitution," but is vitally essential to citizenship or a political status, it would be sophistry indeed to hold them synonymous.

The term "inhabitant" has never been defined by the courts in connection with this clause of the Constitution, as the House is the sole judge of the qualifications of its Members, so we must look elsewhere for an authentic definition. The intent of the framers should govern if that can be ascertained, and we insist it is very patent from the only definite construction of the word which has ever been in common usage. There has been no marked change in the commonly accepted meaning of the term since 1787, when the Constitution was framed.

Webster's New International Dictionary says of "inhabitant":

"One who dwells or resides permanently in a place, as distinguished from a transient lodger or visitor."

"It ordinarily implies more fixity of abode than resident."

"Inhabitant, the general term, implies permanent abode; citizen, enjoyment of the full rights and privileges of allegiance."

Entick Dictionary, London, 1786, gives the following:

"Inhabitant, one who dwells in a place."

Dr. Samuel Johnson's Dictionary, 1770, gives the following:

"Inhabitant, dweller; one who lives or resides in a place."

Ash's Dictionary, 1775, gives the following:

"Inhabitant: A dweller, one that resides in a place."

Dyche's English Dictionary, 1794, gives the following:

"Inhabitant: One who lives in a place or house, a dweller."

Law dictionaries contemporaneous with the framing of the Constitution do not vary from this. A new Law Dictionary, by Giles Jacob, ninth edition, published in London, 1772, gives the following:

"Inhabitant: Is a dweller or householder in any place."

Doctor Burn's Law Dictionary, published in London, 1792, Vol. II, page 21:

"The word 'inhabitant' doth not extend to lodgers, servants, or the like; but to householders only."

Burrill's Law Dictionary says:

"The Latin Habitara, the root of this word, imparts by its very construction frequency, constancy, permanency, closeness of connection, attachment, both physical and moral; and the word 'in' serves to give additional force to these senses."

Black's Law Dictionary:

"Inhabitant: One who resides actually and permanently in a given place, and has his domicile there."

In Book I, chapter 19, section 213, Vattel says:

"The term 'inhabitant' is derived from abode and habitation, and not from political privileges."

We think the test of inhabitancy is a permanent and fixed abode with the personal presence of the individual in that place, ordinarily; and absence from it must be for a cause temporary in its nature, with the intent to return to said place of abode to reside as soon as the purpose of the said absent mission is accomplished. The absent mission may be in its nature for pleasure, business, or public duty. When said absence is for the purpose of engaging in a business or occupation which calls for the establishment of a home and indeterminate presence therein pursuant to said activity, we consider the former inhabitancy broken, or suspended at least until it again takes on the degree of permanency it formerly had. The overwhelming weight of authority, both as to legal construction and definition, support this view.

Every recognized authority, whether legal or otherwise, excludes the idea of temporary residence, and holds that the term "inhabitant" carries with it the necessity of a fixed and permanent home, the place at which one is habitually present under ordinary circumstances, and to which, when he departs for temporary purposes, he intends to return. This is the common and only justified construction of the word.

The constitution of New Hampshire, adopted in 1792, shows clearly what the common acceptation and meaning of this term was in the following declaration:

"And every person qualified as this constitution provides, shall be considered an inhabitant, for the purpose of electing and being elected into any office or placed within this State, in the town, parish, and plantation where he dwelleth or hath his home."

The constitution of Massachusetts, adopted in 1780, Chapter I, section 2, article 2, declares that—

"to remove all doubts concerning the word 'inhabitant,' in this constitution, every person shall be considered an inhabitant (for the purpose of electing and being elected into any office or place within this State) in that town, district, or plantation, where he dwelleth or hath his home."

This constitution was amended in 1821 to confer the right to vote on citizens who have resided in the State one year, and in the town or district six months. In 46 Mass. (5 Metc.) 587, 588, it was held that "inhabitant" as used in the original constitution is identical in meaning and synonymous with "citizen who has resided," as expressed in the amendment. These provisions and construction are the best possible means of determining the exact use made of the term at that time. Some of the men who were in the National Constitutional Convention were members of the State conventions that placed in the documents themselves this definition of "inhabitant."

On the 8th of August, 1787, in the Constitutional Convention, the committee of detail struck out of the text at this place the word "resident" and substituted the word "inhabitant." The motion was made by Mr. Sherman and seconded by Mr. Madison, who thought the latter less vague, and would permit absence for a considerable time on public or private business without disqualification. They were trying to get away from the abuse being made of the loose construction of "resident" by personal enemies of those who sought to qualify. There is no suggestion of an uncommon meaning to be given the word in their use of it here. The construction placed on these statements of Mr. Madison and others by Mr. BECK is to apply it to his case wherein he was absent from Pennsylvania 23 years, under his own admission, and yet he would not be disqualified on the grounds of inhabitancy. (Rec. p. 15.) And this regardless of the fact that during that time he had been an inhabitant of New York, New Jersey, and the District of Columbia, and had voted in both these States, and still has his only true home in Washington. Nothing was further from the thoughts of these great men.

Mr. James Wilson preferred "inhabitant" to "resident." Statements made by him and Mr. Sherman at other stages of the debates prove conclusively that they would not countenance a provision to permit representation by one who had not had his actual habitation among his constituents for such a long time. The brilliant James

Wilson, when insisting on election of the Members of the House by the people, as shown in Formation of the Union, page 755, said:

"Mr. Wilson is of the opinion that the national legislative powers ought to flow immediately from the people so as to contain all their understanding and to be an exact transcript of their minds."

Mr. Sherman, in advocating annual election of Members of the House, said:

"Mr. Sherman thought Representatives should return home and mix with the people. By remaining at the seat of government they would acquire the habits of the place, which might differ from those of their constituents. So he perferred annual elections. (Formation of the Union, p. 256.)

"Mr. SHERMAN. I am for one year. Our people are accustomed to annual elections. Should the Members have a longer duration of service and remain at the seat of government, they may forget their constituents and perhaps imbibe the interest of the State in which they reside, or there may be danger of catching the esprit de corps." (Formation of the Union, p. 794.)

And this from the man who moved to substitute "inhabitant" for "resident." He was unwilling that a man should stay more than a year at the seat of government before giving an account of his convictions to his people.

In placing this limitation on qualifications for membership in the House it was an attempt on their part to preserve the coloring of local State convictions, State feelings, which might be lost if men with attachments to other locations and other conditions were permitted to sit for them; that otherwise they feared attachments for State governments would be lost to the General Government, and usurpation of powers by the latter encouraged. No fear was ever better founded or more completely borne out by the present trend toward centralization.

In Story on the Constitution, Volume I, article 619, he says:

"The object of this clause, doubtless, was to secure an attachment to, and a just representation of, the interests of the State in the national councils. It was supposed that an inhabitant would feel a deeper concern and possess a more enlightened view of the various interests of his constituents than a mere stranger. And, at all events, he would generally possess more entirely their sympathy and confidence."

In Constitution of the United States, by John Randolph Tucker, Volume I, pages 394, 395, we find:

"This inhabitancy or domicile of the person in the State which chooses him was to exclude all who, by noninhabitancy, might secure an election when by reason of no community of interest, with the constituency, he would be unfitted to represent it."

There was the purpose, no doubt, as shown by the committee discussion, to guard against corruption by the wealthy who might hunt for a district to purchase. But the very foundation of representative government, to their minds, rested on their ability to insure a true reflection of local sentiment in the most numerous legislative branch. They sought to make the House a cross section of national thought, of national aspirations, of national feelings. They will that their Government should always have a common interest with the people and be administered for their good, be responsive to their will; so it was essential to their rights and liberties that the Members of the House should have an immediate instruction from and sympathy with the people. Hence the reasonableness of the provision that a person, to become a Representative, must have a bona fide and permanent abode and actually live among his future constituents. No habitual nonresident is eligible.

The leading case directly in point is that of John Bailey, of Massachusetts, decided in the Eighteenth Congress, as shown in Hinds' Precedents, Volume I, page 419.

On October 1, 1817, Mr. Bailey was appointed a clerk in the State Department from his father's home in Massachusetts, and held said position for six years. During that time he lived in Washington in hotels until a year before his election in September, 1823, at which time he married in Washington and moved into the home of his wife's mother. He had made occasional visits back to Massachusetts, had his library there, claimed his father's home as his habitation, declared his stay in Washington temporary, and that his real habitation was Massachusetts.

In the report adopted in that case Annals of Congress, volume 41, page 1594, a full discussion and interpretation of the word "inhabitant" is given. It is set forth that the word was substituted for "resident" as being a "stronger" term, intended to express more clearly their intention that the persons to be elected should be completely identified with the State in which they were to be chosen. Because of the importance of this case, we quote extensively from the report as follows:

I

"The difficulty attending the interpretation of constitutional provisions, which depend on the construction of a particular word, renders it necessary to complete explication, to obtain, if possible a knowledge of the reasons which influenced the framers of the Constitution in the adoption and use of the word 'inhabitant' and to make an endeavor at ascertaining, as far as practicable, whether they intended it to apply, according to its common acceptation, to the persons whose abode, living, ordinary habitation, or home should be within the State in which they should be chosen, or, on the contrary, according to some uncommon or technical meaning.

II

"The true theory of the representative Government is bottomed on the principle that public opinion is to direct the legislation of the country, subject to the provisions of the Constitution, and the most effectual means of securing a due regard to the public interest, and a proper solicitude to relieve the public inconveniences, is to have the Representative selected from the bosom of that society which is composed of his constituents. A knowledge of the character of the people for whom one is called to act is truly necessary, as well as of the views which they entertain of public affairs. This can only be acquired by mingling in their company and joining in their conversations; but, above all, that reciprocity of feeling and identity of interest, so necessary to relations of this kind, and which operate as a mutual guaranty between the parties, can only exist, in their full extent, among members of the same community.

"All these reasons conspire to render it absolutely necessary that every well-regulated government should have in its constitution a provision which should embrace those advantages; and there can be no doubt it was from considerations of this kind, that that convention wisely determined to insert in the Constitution that provision which declares no person shall be a Member of either House of Congress 'who shall not at the time of the election be an inhabitant of that State in which he shall be chosen,' meaning thereby that they should be bona fide members of the State, subject to all the requisitions of its laws and entitled to all the privileges and advantages which they confer. That this subject occupied the particular attention of the convention and that the word 'inhabitant' was not introduced without due consideration and discussion is evident from the journals, by which it appears that in the draft of a constitution reported by the committee of five on the 6th of August the word 'resident' was contained, and that on the 8th of that same month the convention amended that report by striking out 'resident' and inserting 'inhabitant' as a stronger term, intended more clearly to express their intention that the persons to be elected should be completely identified with the State in which they were to be chosen. Having examined the case in connection with the probable reasons which influenced the minds of the members of the convention and led to the use of the word 'inhabitant' in the Constitution in relation to Senators and Representatives in Congress, it may not be improper, before an attempt is made at a further definition of the word, a little to consider that of citizen with the view of showing that many of the misconceptions in respect to the former have arisen from confounding it with the latter.

"The word 'inhabitant' comprehends a simple fact, locality of existence; that of 'citizen,' a combination of civil privileges, some of which may be enjoyed in any of the States in the Union. The word 'citizen' may properly be construed to mean a member of a political society; and although he might be absent for years and cease to be an inhabitant of its territory, his rights of citizenship may not be thereby forfeited, but may be resumed whenever he may choose to return; or, indeed, such of them as are not interdicted by the requisition of inhabitancy may be considered as reserved, as, for instance, in many of the States a person who by reason of absence would not be eligible to a seat in the legislature might be appointed a judge of any of their courts. The reason of this is obvious. The judges are clothed with no discretionary powers about which the public opinion is necessary to be consulted; they are not makers but expounders of the law, and the constitution and statutes of the State are the only authorities they have to consult and obey.

III

"If citizenship in one part of the Union was only to be acquired by a formal renunciation of allegiance to the State from which the person came previous to his being admitted to the rights of citizenship in the State to which he had removed, the expression of an intention to return would be of importance; but as it is it can have no bearing on the case; the doctrine is not applicable to citizens of this confederacy removing from one State and settling in another; nor can it in the present case be considered as going to establish inhabitancy in Massachusetts, when the fact is conceded that at the time of the election, and for nearly six years before, Mr. Bailey was actually an inhabitant of the city of Washington, in the District of Columbia, and by the charter of the city and the laws in force in the District was, to all intents and purposes, as much an inhabitant thereof as though he had been born and resided there during the whole period of his life, and the refusal to exercise the rights of a citizen can be of no consequence in the case. It is not the exercise of privileges that constitutes a citizen; it is being a citizen that gives the title to those privileges."

If the former action of the House is to have any weight with us now, this Bailey decision definitely disposes of the major contention that a political status is the answer to inhabitancy. Mr. Madison was then alive and vigorous, and no doubt watched with interest every interpretation of the Constitution. Had this decision done any violence to the intention of the framers, it would have been his nature to protest. But no comment from him can be found. And no holding of the House has ever reversed or modified the principles of interpretation established in this report.

It is apparent that temporary absence from a regular habitation on private or official business does not disqualify under this clause. The same committee which reported the Bailey case, and at the same session, in the Forsyth case, so held. But the presence of Mr. BECK in his home in Washington can not stand on that exception. He purchased his home here and moved into it from a full citizenship of the State of New York some seven months before he became connected with a Government position. He remained an inhabitant of the District of Columbia from June, 1925, until July, 1926, with no official connection whatsoever, before he rented the apartment in Philadelphia. And in this connection let it be denied, as charged by him, that almost one-half the Senate and a large number of the House who have homes here are in a similar position to his.

The Members of Congress referred to, when elected, were bona fide inhabitants of their respective States. Any home established here for their use is incident to the discharge of public duty, temporary, and does not destroy the status of inhabitancy they had when elected. He seeks to reverse that order by having his real habitation in Washington to begin with an attempting to create a fictitious abode in the State of Pennsylvania for the purposes of qualification and not as an incident to service after election. There is no such wholesale condition of noninhabitancy prevailing, but if such were the case the House would have all the more reason to check a flagrant violation of the Constitution.

His former residence in Pennsylvania can not enter into this consideration, for the reason that, at least for 23 years, he was completely severed and divorced from that State so far as any pretense to habitation or voting privilege or citizenship is concerned. He divested himself of every privilege of citizenship in Pennsylvania to avail himself of the superior advantages he would have in moving to New York. His claim must stand or fall on the facts developing after July, 1926. It will be observed from the record that Mr. BECK had but little to do personally with the effort to qualify him under the State law for voting. Undoubtedly he did not even familiarize himself with the legal requirements for voting. While he was in Europe and two months before he rented any apartment, he was entered on the assessment roll for a voting tax out of the regular order and of date exactly six months before the November election, the time required for returning to citizenship in that State. He never regarded this assessment enough to pay the 25-cent tax. He did not run for Congress that year because he did not get the indorsement of the Vare organization. A brother-in-law of Mr. VARE was nominated and elected.

The question then arose as to the legality of the election of Mr. VARE to the Senate and his right to a seat therein, and Mr. BECK because of counsel for him. He was assessed in the semiannual assessment for 1926 and again ignored it. Twice in 1927 Mr. BECK's name was placed on the assessors' list, once out of regular order, which assessment was again ignored by him, and Mr. VARE's office procured the only tax receipt of any kind he has purchased in that State, 25 cents each for him and Mrs. Beck, and delivered it to him in said office. He registered the next day and voted in the primary 10 days later, in which the Member of Congress from that district was nominated for a city office and immediately resigned his seat.

Thereupon the Vare organization, through Mr. VARE's secretary, notified Mr. BECK that he would be nominated for Congress at a certain time, and for him to be in waiting. He was called for at the designated time, conducted to a hall, and was formally notified of and accepted the nomination from the seven men present, who had nominated him, two of whom he states he knows. He made no canvass whatever in this district for the purpose of developing sentiment in his favor or for expressing his views on national issues.

Mr. BECK made only three speeches in Philadelphia in the city-wide campaign in November, 1927, general election, at which time he was elected, all on Friday or Saturday next before the election on Tuesday, and then left immediately for his Washington home. He did not vote in the said election the following Tuesday for the reason that he was at home and not in Pennsylvania. He had entertained anxiety that an adverse city election for the Vare ticket would be construed as a repudiation of his client, and his speeches had been made in an effort to avert this.

In a day when a political machine can select any individual it chooses to put into the House there are multiplied dangers to those the fathers knew when they made this inhibition. Without reflecting in the least on the personal desirability of Mr. BECK, it is clear that, if his contention is to prevail, an all-powerful, though it be an unscrupulous, combine in control of a district machine can select anyone they need for any special purpose, and the House would be powerless to resist it. All that would be required of their choice would be to establish what can be termed a technical, constructive, fictitious, superficial, fly-by-night residence and then go a-carpetbagging. This presages a radical and serious departure from the fundamentals of representative government as we know it.

This is not a case of simply thwarting the will of a constituency. We consider that any constituency should have the right of choice, but that choice must be within constitutional bounds. Our charter of liberties, the Constitution, should stand above the aspirations of an individual who would subvert it or the action of constituencies who ignore it. If Mr. BECK is to retain his seat we view the precedent, not as a part of the general "erosion" of the Constitution, but as a frontal attack on it, a blasting process which is to weaken the foundation of the great American dream of representative government.

Respectfully submitted.

GORDON BROWNING.
T. WEBBER WILSON.

Mr. VINCENT of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, before we proceed perhaps we had better have some understanding as to time. The rule, I understand, gives an hour of debate. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BROWNING], I presume, would like an extension of that time.

Mr. BROWNING. I would desire all the time that can possibly be given for discussion.

Mr. VINCENT of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I think it is advisable that there be longer than half an hour to a side on this matter, and I am perfectly willing and ask consent to double that time. I ask unanimous consent that debate be limited to two hours, one-half of that time to be controlled by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BROWNING] and one-half by myself.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent that the time for general debate be extended to two hours upon this resolution and substitute, one-half of that time to be controlled by himself and one-half by the gentleman from Tennessee, at the end of which time the previous question shall be considered as ordered. Is there objection?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I do it for the purpose of asking the gentleman from Michigan how this matter comes before the House at this late day. Under the rules passed some time ago the committee is required to make a report on a contested-election case within six months. In this case the committee did report within six months, and yet we are almost at the end of the Congress before the House has opportunity to pass upon it.

Mr. VINCENT of Michigan. In explanation of the delay I will say that a date was fixed for the matter, and unfortunately one of the Senators from Michigan at the last session died at that time and the delegation from Michigan attended his funeral, and later on I myself was confined to a hospital, and for that reason there was a delay in bringing this case before the House.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. It is not the purpose of the gentleman and of the Election Committee to disregard the rule?

Mr. VINCENT of Michigan. No. I can speak not only for myself but for every member of the committee when I say they desire to have these matters disposed of at the very earliest time.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Would the gentleman from Michigan be willing to extend the time?

Mr. VINCENT of Michigan. I understand the program before the House to-day includes another important matter. I think that the question before us, which is a clear and narrow question, can be fully considered in two hours.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. It is a question with some Members of the House whether there might not perhaps be a longer time allowed. Of course, the matter is in the gentleman's control, and we will have to accept with as much grace as we can the gentleman's suggestion.

Mr. VINCENT of Michigan. Personally I want to be perfectly fair in this matter. I think heretofore I have been quite fair, and I think I am quite fair now, in view of the other bill that is pending before the House to be disposed of to-day.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I would like to prefer the request, if I may, to make it three hours, one-half the time to be controlled by the gentleman from Michigan and one-half by the gentleman from Tennessee; one hour and a half to a side.

Mr. VINCENT of Michigan. I am sorry, but I can not yield to that suggestion.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Then I hope the gentleman will not insist on that part of his request, that the previous question be considered as ordered at the end of two hours, although I do not suppose there will be objection to the previous question.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, I suggest that we make it two and one-half hours, and regard the previous question as ordered, the time to be equally divided.

Mr. VINCENT of Michigan. I will modify my request, Mr. Speaker, to conform to that suggestion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent that the time be extended to two and one-half hours, one hour and a quarter to be controlled by each side, and at the conclusion of that time the previous question shall be considered as ordered. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan is recognized.

Mr. VINCENT of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I would like to be advised when I shall have consumed 20 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Very well.

Mr. VINCENT of Michigan. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, this matter comes before the House in a form a little different from most election contests. This matter was referred to Committee on Elections No. 2 by House Resolution 9, which raised the question whether Mr. JAMES M. BECK was entitled to a seat in this House to which he had been elected because of the question as to whether or not he was at the time of his election an inhabitant of the State of Pennsylvania, as required by the Constitution.

That is the bare and only question that is presented in this case. There is no contest except that this matter was referred to the committee for its inquiry and report. No charge of fraud or any wrongdoing of any kind is asserted against Mr. BECK or his right to a seat. The Constitution of the United States provides that no person shall be a Representative who shall not have attained the age of 25 years and been seven years a citizen of the United States, and who shall not, when elected, be an inhabitant of that State in which he was chosen. The question before the House is whether or not Mr. BECK was an inhabitant of the State of Pennsylvania at the time he was chosen.

That question, of course, depends for its solution upon the facts presented in the case and upon the precedents which this House has established. I hope the House will give careful attention to the facts as they were developed by the committee in this inquiry. They show that Mr. BECK was born in Philadelphia, in the State of Pennsylvania, in 1861; that he was raised there; that he obtained his college education in that State; that he was called to the bar and practiced law in Philadelphia; that he held the office of assistant United States attorney in that city; that later he held the office of United States attorney in that city; that in 1900, having resided there continuously, he was appointed Assistant Attorney General of the United States. He held this office until 1903, when he resigned it. At the time he resigned the office of Assistant Attorney General of the United States he had lived continuously in Philadelphia from his birth.

He testified before the committee—and it is not controverted, except incidentally—that in 1903 he resigned the office of Assistant Attorney General of the United States and gave up his residence in Philadelphia and took up his residence in the city of New York for the practice of law. He testified that it was his purpose in going to the city of New York to practice law to gain for himself a competence, with the hope and intention then, at that time, of returning to Philadelphia to take up his residence when such a competence had been acquired. He resided in New York and practiced law there until 1920. That period was from 1903 to 1920. In 1920 he sold his home in New York City and gave up every residential connection with that city. He came to Washington and purchased a home here in Washington on Twenty-first Street, and came here and occupied that house. He came here to Washington at that time in the expectation that he would receive an appointment to the public service in the Harding administration. In 1921 he was appointed Solicitor General of the United States by President Harding.

In the interim, while he was residing in the city of New York, he purchased a summer home at Sea Bright, N. J., on the ocean. It was useful only for a summer place. He has continued to own that place up to the time of the inquiry by the committee.

In 1925 he resigned the office of Solicitor General of the United States on account of failing eyesight, and testified that he then intended to take up his residence again and reassume and reidentify his interests with the city of his birth, Philadelphia. After resigning from the office of Solicitor General of the United States he was appointed by the mayor of Philadelphia to visit foreign countries and interest them in the Sesquicentennial Exposition to be held in Philadelphia. He did travel abroad on that commission. A little later, in 1926, he was appointed by President Coolidge as one of the commissioners of the Sesquicentennial Exposition, the law requiring that two commissioners be appointed from each State, and Mr. BECK was appointed as one of the commissioners to the governing body of that exposition to represent thereon the State of Pennsylvania. In 1926, in addition to going abroad under this commission and continuing the work of interesting foreign nations in the Sesquicentennial, he opened negotiations, in the spring of that year, for the acquirement of a place of abode in the city of Philadelphia. Prior to doing so he addressed one of the clubs that he had been a member of ever since his original residence in Philadelphia, stating that it was his purpose at that time to come back to Philadelphia, to reassume his citizenship thereof, and to reidentify himself with the interests of his native city.

These negotiations for an apartment in Philadelphia continued along until June, 1926. On the 6th day of July, 1926, a lease was entered into between the owner of an apartment house and Mr. BECK wherein Mr. BECK leased an apartment in the Richelieu Apartments in the city of Philadelphia, on Spruce Street, in the first congressional district thereof, for the sum of $110 a month, for an unfurnished apartment. This lease was to run from year to year unless one party or the other gave two months' notice of its ending. That lease continued in force up until at least the conclusion of the inquiry and, as I understand it, has continued since. Mr. BECK immediately furnished that apartment in proper order as a place of abode and entered into possession of it. He has maintained it ever since that time. He testified before the committee that he had occupied that apartment in the city of Philadelphia at least twice a week ever since he had acquired it; that a large portion of the time it is occupied by his sister, who makes her place of abode there when it is not occupied by Mr. BECK himself.

Now, mind you, that was in July, 1926. During all of the period of time that Mr. BECK had been away from the city of Philadelphia, from 1903 until the occasion I speak of in 1926, as supporting his testimony that he did always intend to return to the city of Philadelphia and reidentify himself with its interests, he had maintained his membership in a number of civic organizations in that city. I might state to the House some of those organizations in which he had maintained his membership during all those years in the city of Philadelphia as having some bearing on the intention of Mr. BECK with respect to his citizenship in that city. He had continued to be a member of the Fairmount Park Art Association, which has for its purpose the progress of art and the embellishment of public places in that city. He had continued to be a member of the Philadelphia Commission, which has a somewhat similar purpose; the City Parks Association; the American Philosophical Society; the Art Club; the Legal Club; the Shakespeare Society; the Mahogany Tree Club; the Franklin Inn Club; the New England Society of Pennsylvania; the Historical Society of Pennsylvania; and some other social organizations.

Mr. BECK acquired this place of abode in Philadelphia in July, 1926. He was assessed for personal taxes in the city of Philadelphia thereafter. In 1927 he applied for registration as a voter in the city of Philadelphia, and he was registered as a voter there without challenge; he voted there in the city primaries in September, 1927. At that time he was not running for office and he was not a candidate for Congress.

The Congressman elect was Mr. Hazlett, of Philadelphia. After the primary in September, 1927, Mr. Hazlett resigned, and the properly constituted authority of the Republican Party in the first congressional district of Philadelphia nominated Mr. BECK as the candidate for Congress in the by-election which was held November 6, 1927, to contest as its candidate for a seat in this House. The Democratic Party chose as its candidate Mr. J. P. Mulrenan. At the election held November 6, 1927, Mr. BECK was elected by a majority of over 60,000.

During the period of time that he had control of and occupied this apartment in the city of Philadelphia, he continued to maintain his house in the District of Columbia on Twenty-first Street. He occupied it when it was convenient for him to do so and he occupied the apartment in Philadelphia when it was convenient for him to do so. He also has continued to own the summer property on the ocean front at Sea Bright, N. J.

When Mr. BECK left New York and came to the District of Columbia he registered and voted at Sea Bright, N. J., where his summer house was. He cast his last vote there in the presidential election of 1924 and has not done anything on his part to maintain his registration and status as a voter at that place since the election of 1924. As I stated before, after he had acquired the leasehold on the apartment in Philadelphia and had continued to hold it for the constitutional period of time as fixed by the constitution of Pennsylvania he registered and voted in the primaries in Philadelphia in 1927.

In the hearings some question was raised with respect to this registration. In my own view of the constitutional provision I think that is an immaterial matter, but I desire to point it out to the House for its consideration. The law of the State of Pennsylvania requires that, in order to register, you must have paid a tax of some kind. If you have not paid a real estate or a personal-property tax prior to the registration you must pay a poll tax of 25 cents. The law provides that this poll tax must be paid by the individual in person to the proper official receiving taxes or that it be paid by an agent who is authorized in writing to pay it for his principal. It has been suggested in the hearings before the committee that Mr. BECK in his registration failed to comply entirely with that statute. These are the facts concerning that matter: He was sitting in the office of Senator VARE, in Philadelphia, across the street from the office where the receiver of taxes has his place of business. By telephone call it was suggested to the office of the receiver of taxes as to where Mr. Beck was at that moment, and that he desired to pay his poll tax. One of the clerks from that office came over to the office where Mr. BECK was sitting and came to the door of the room in which he was sitting in a chair. The door was opened and the young man from the tax collector's office had in his hand an envelope containing the tax receipts for Mrs. Beck and Mr. BECK.

Mr. BECK, instead of handing the 50 cents personally to the young man who came from the collector's office; instead of doing that, the young man stayed at the doorway and another person in the office took the envelope over and handed it to Mr. BECK, to whom he handed 50 cents, who carried it to the man at the door and handed it to him.

To my mind this is too technical a matter to be considered as throwing suspicion upon the registration of Mr. BECK.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan has consumed 20 minutes.

Mr. VINCENT of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself 15 minutes more.

Mr. BECK, when he presented himself for registration as a resident in the city of Philadelphia, subjected himself to all of the obligations of that status. He immediately subjected himself, of course, to an assessment for his personal property, and that assessment promptly was made, and he is assessed for his personal property in the city of Philadelphia.

It further appears that all of his personal financial business is transacted in Philadelphia, the Girard Trust Co. being his fiscal agent for that purpose.

It is fair to say to the House that the house in Washington owned by Mr. BECK is a more commodious, better furnished house than the apartment in Philadelphia.

It is true also that two of the clubs to which I have referred in the city of Philadelphia have nonresident and resident rosters. When Mr. BECK was in New York he was carried as a nonresident member of these two clubs. When he came back, his attention was called to it—he had not personally paid his dues, his secretary attending to that—and he immediately had his status changed to a resident member of the club, to which his attention was called. It appeared in the hearing that the other single club which carried a nonresident roster still carried him as a nonresident member.

It appeared, too, that the automobiles which Mr. BECK owns and operates here in Washington were provided with District of Columbia licenses.

I think this is a fair statement of the facts connected with this matter. The testimony shows Mr. BECK has occupied this apartment about twice a week during the period of time he has had it, a year and a half before he was elected to Congress, except when he was absent from the city in Europe in connection with the Sesquicentennial Exposition, where he went in the employ and in the interest of the very city where he now claims his inhabitancy to be. Of course, he was not in the apartment during the time of these trips, but he went abroad as a representative of the city of Philadelphia and in connection with its work and, incidentally, without remuneration therefor, because of his interest in its civic affairs.

Now, there is a precedent established by this House that in my own honest belief seems to dispose of this case if it is followed by this House, which precedent I think an examination will show has never been disturbed, and that is the case of Philip B. Key, of Maryland, who was elected to Congress in the Tenth Congress in 1806.

At that time many of the framers of the Constitution were still living; Thomas Jefferson was then President of the United States; Madison was later to become President of the United States.

These are the facts in the Philip B. Key case:

Mr. Key was born and raised and educated and called to the bar and practiced law continuously as a resident of the State of Maryland. He was born before the Constitution was adopted, of course. He lived there and practiced law until 1801, when he disposed of every semblance of a habitation in the State of Maryland and removed to a house which he owned in the District of Columbia at Georgetown. This house in Georgetown was the only house he possessed from 1801 until 1806.

About 1805 or 1806 he purchased a tract of land out in Maryland, upon which there was no house. He gave a contract in the spring of 1805 to erect thereon for his use a summer home, and it is set forth in the record of that case that this was useful only for a summer home. Before that house was entirely finished he removed with his family from the house in Georgetown out to the summer house in Maryland. He made this removal in September, 1806. He retained the house in Georgetown, in the District of Columbia, fully and completely furnished as it had been before.

Eighteen days after he moved his family out to the summer house in Maryland he was elected in an election to Congress. Twelve days after the election he moved back into the house in Georgetown, and he moved back and forth as his convenience dictated. He would spend the winter in his house in Georgetown and the following early summer move out with his family to the house in Maryland.

When he came to take his seat in this House his right to do so was challenged on the ground that he was not when elected an inhabitant of the State of Maryland.

There was prolonged discussion on this point; and the House, after full consideration, having in view the fact that he was born in that State, had been in the past identified with its interests, was returning to settle again in it when he went back 18 days before the election to his house there, found that he was, within the meaning of the constitutional provision, an inhabitant of the State of Maryland and sustained his right to a seat in this House.

To my mind there is no legal difference between these two cases, except, it seems to me, that Mr. BECK's case presents a stronger argument for his right to a seat than did that of Mr. Key.

There are these differences which you may consider. Mr. BECK, when he moved from Philadelphia, moved first into the State of New York, later came to the District of Columbia, and from there proceeded to Pennsylvania. Mr. Key did not have any intervening residence in a different State. But inhabitancy is a matter of mixed fact and intent on the part of the person, and I can see no legal difference in the situation of a man who gives up entirely his home in a given State and moves to the District of Columbia and then returns, as Mr. Key did, than in the case of a man who gives up his physical residence, moves to the State of New York, then to the District of Columbia, and then reestablishes his residence or inhabitancy in his original State.

There is this other difference between these two cases, that Mr. BECK in his tenure in the apartment in Philadelphia has a leasehold, while Mr. Key when he went back into Maryland had a freehold estate. But, to my mind, again—and I think to the Members of this House—it is well known that people are commonly making their inhabitancy, their abode in this country, in places where they hold it by lease as well as where they hold it by fee simple title. In the case of Mr. Key, his physical inhabitancy of that State existed for 18 days prior to the election. In the case of Mr. BECK it existed for 18 months before election.

It was argued in the hearings before the committee that there was another precedent which threw doubt on the applicability and standing of the Key precedent. That is the case of Bailey of Massachusetts—and, by the way, this Key case can be found on page 417, volume 1, Hinds' Precedents. In the case of Bailey he was a man who lived in Massachusetts in the house of his father and mother, when he was appointed on October 1, 1817, to a clerkship in the Department of State. He continued to hold that clerkship and to stay here in the District of Columbia and look after the duties of his clerkship until 1823, when he was elected to a seat in Congress from the district in Massachusetts where he had grown up. He had in the meantime, according to the report of the committee, maintained absolutely no indicia of any place of abode whatever in the State of Massachusetts during all of the period that he was engaged in the State Department. He married while he was here in the District of Columbia, and he and his wife established their residence, the place where they lived at least, in the home of her mother here in the District of Columbia. There was no house, no place of abode, no habitation of any kind in the district in Massachusetts which elected him to Congress from the period when he came to the State Department in 1817 until he was elected. The House in that case held that he did not conform to the provision of the Constitution requiring a man to be an inhabitant.

I think myself that to consider a man an inhabitant of a State where he has no habitation would be a contradiction in terms, and that the holding of the House was correct, and that it does not in any way affect the validity of the Key precedent, nor of the right of Mr. BECK as the facts are presented here.

I think my time has almost expired and I must leave time for others.

Mr. Speaker, I reverence the Constitution of the United States. I would not vote to keep any man here who I considered had violated it with respect to his qualifications for his seat in the House, not even a man of the attainments of Mr. BECK of Pennsylvania, but I feel that the true conception of the thing is this, that in the last analysis for a fit membership of this House of Representatives we have got to depend upon the patriotism and the intelligence and the common sense of the people who inhabit the various districts of the country, and that after a district has selected a man deliberately at the polls by an unquestioned majority, before this House denies to that constituency the right to have the man of their choice represent them in this House, we ought to be perfectly certain and absolutely clear that his election does violate the Constitution of the United States, and until that is clear, and it is not in this case, that constituency should have the right to be represented by the representative of its choice. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. BRAND of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, may I be permitted to ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. VINCENT of Michigan. I yield the gentleman half a minute.

Mr. BRAND of Georgia. I simply wanted to ask whether Mr. Key was a married or a single man?

Mr. VINCENT of Michigan. He was a married man with a family.

Mr. BROWNING. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself 30 minutes and ask unanimous consent to extend and revise my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BROWNING. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I regret exceedingly, of course, at any time to find myself in disagreement with the very delightful gentleman who is the chairman of my committee, and I wish to say that in my experience of six years' service with him on that committee this is the first time we have disagreed on any major issue with respect to an election contest. Neither am I free from the influence that always affects Members when they are voting on the seat of a colleague for whom they have the highest regard. But in my humble judgment the test of fidelity to my oath when I asserted that I would uphold and defend the Constitution of the United States comes when I am called upon to apply it to a friend and to some one whom I do hold in high regard and whose ability and capacity is unquestioned, as is the case in the matter of Mr. BECK.

I hope the membership will not consider that any political or partisan consideration has entered into this case so far as I am concerned, because there is nothing to be gained from a partisan standpoint, if Mr. BECK should be unseated. No one is contesting his seat. I do regard it an important matter when we have a mandate of the Constitution, and we come to a deliberate conclusion that our Constitution has been violated, that we vote in accordance with our convictions. That is why I am here to-day offering the substitute resolution in this case.

I have listened very attentively to the facts stated by the chairman of the committee. You will pardon me if I reiterate and add to some of those statements in giving my recollection of the facts in the case. Mr. BECK, after being a Federal official in the city of Philadelphia, came to Washington in 1900 as an Assistant Attorney General of the United States. He held that position until 1903, when he resigned to take up the practice of law in the city of New York. At that time he sold all of his property, so far as residences are concerned, in the city of Philadelphia and the State of Pennsylvania, and in Washington if he had any, and bought a home in the city of New York and lived there and practiced law until 1920, in November, just after the presidential election. He voted there in all elections until after 1920. He then came to the city of Washington, selling his New York home and severing all residential relations there, and bought a home on Twenty-first Street in this city and moved his family here, moved his extensive private library here, moved his art treasures and other things he had which comport with his accustomed degree of comfort, to which, of course, he was clearly entitled in the place where he lived. He retained his summer home at Sea Bright, N. J. He went back there to spend his summers on the ocean front and established a voting residence there, registered and paid taxes there, and he and his wife voted from there by mail in the presidential election of 1924.

In 1921, as has been stated, he was appointed Solicitor General of the United States by President Harding. That was several months after he had completely severed his relations in New York and after he got a home in Washington and moved into the home with his family. He acted in that capacity for four years, approximately. He resigned from his position as a public official, I believe, because of his eyesight failing. After his resignation he never moved his residence, he never moved his home or acquired a home elsewhere. He established a law office in the Southern Building in Washington and began the practice of law as a specialist in practice before the Supreme Court of the United States. He also renewed his connection with his law firm in the city of New York.

Since 1900 Mr. BECK has not practiced law in the State of Pennsylvania. Now, in 1926, Mr. BECK states he wished for two reasons to get a residential relation in the State of Pennsylvania. One was that he wanted to reestablish his connections with that State, he said, and the other was that he wanted to come to Congress from the first district of that State. In company with a Mr. Greenfield, a real estate man and a man of considerable connection in politics of that city, he went over the first district looking for a desirable apartment. He did not contract for one, but went to Europe on a business trip. While he was gone Mr. Greenfield seems to have made a selection of an apartment in the Richelieu Apartments, 1414 Spruce Street, and reserved it for Mr. BECK. It has one bedroom, one living room, a kitchenette, and bath. After Mr. BECK got back, and on the 6th of July, 1926, he signed a lease for this apartment as of June 1 of that year, agreeing, and has paid since that time, according to the proof, $110 a month rental. He furnished it. I do not remember the testimony exactly as does the chairman when he states the amount of time Mr. BECK says he has been in the apartment. I do remember definitely, page 53 of the hearings, Mr. BECK's statement was that he had been in Philadelphia most every week since that time except summers and when he was in Europe on business. He stated that while in Philadelphia, up to about the 1st of January, 1927, he stayed in the apartment at night. After that time his sister, Miss Helen Beck, returned from Europe, and he turned over the apartment to her; and while she was there he went to either the Arts Club or the Bellevue-Stratford Hotel at night while he was in the city.

His visits there were sometimes to make speeches, but most of them, as was indicated in his statement, were to break the trip between New York and the city of Washington. Mr. BECK's family consists of himself and wife. He has two children, a daughter, whose husband is United States consul at Geneva, and his son, who is still in Europe and has been there since the World War, having served in the American forces. But he says, "My wife and I live alone." In other words, his family consisted of himself and Mrs. Beck. Mrs. Beck has never spent a night in this apartment in the city of Philadelphia, as I remember the record. Mr. BECK has never eaten a meal in that apartment, and so far as the record shows undoubtedly the ordinary, regular, permanent home where Mr. BECK has spent most all of the time since November, 1920, has been in the District of Columbia in his home on Twenty-first Street, Washington.

Now this question comes up: The chairman of the committee suggests that the supreme consideration is to be given the constituency of Mr. BECK in their right to select a person to represent them. In this same clause of the Constitution I call your attention to the fact that there are three inhibitions placed upon men who shall sit in this House: First, they must be 25 years of age; second, they must have been seven years a citizen of the United States; and, third, they must be an inhabitant of the State from which they are chosen at the time they are chosen.

Now, there is no difference in my mind in the effect of these inhibitions. Suppose that a constituency elected a man only 21 years of age to represent it in the House of Representatives, and this question was raised. What are you going to do? Suppose they had selected a man who had been naturalized less than seven years. No matter what his other qualifications are, what are you going to do? The same thing applies to an inhabitant; and the whole thing, my friends, rests on the determination of the question whether Mr. BECK is properly an "inhabitant" within the meaning of the framers of the Constitution.

We are not undertaking, those of us who are supporting the minority views in this case, to override the will of any constituency which is within constitutional bounds. We are not undertaking to disregard the will of the people. We are insisting that the people should rule; that their will is the Constitution. We are insisting that if Mr. BECK is not an inhabitant of the State of Pennsylvania he falls in the same category with those men who are not citizens, or who have not been citizens for seven years, and have not attained the age of 25.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWNING. Certainly.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Is there not this very vital distinction between the two questions on the one side, of age and of being an inhabitant or citizen of this country, that the evidence must be necessarily clear, distinct, and convincing, while in the other case the evidence may be conflicting and may be determined largely upon the intention of the man?

Mr. BROWNING. Not at all. The evidence in each of these cases ought to be treated exactly the same.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Treated exactly the same, but there can not be any real dispute about a man's age, or about how long he has been a citizen.

Mr. BROWNING. We are not disputing the facts in this case. We are taking Mr. BECK'S word for them.

Mr. DEMPSEY. But there can be very easily a dispute about where a man resides in this country, and that question may depend almost wholly upon the intention of the man himself.

Mr. BROWNING. No. The intention does not determine the matter. An intention in this instance is a deduction of law, founded on fact, as has been numerously laid down, not based upon what a man says alone but based upon that and the facts of what he did. That is what I am insisting on. Mr. BECK did make the declaration that he was going back there to Philadelphia where, among his books and art treasures and his friends, he could spend the declining years of his life. But he did not do it. If he had borne out his intention and moved his family to Philadelphia, then his case would be different.

Mr. JACOBSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWNING. Yes.

Mr. JACOBSTEIN. Have you noted the authorities on that point?

Mr. BROWNING. We have cited numerous authorities in the report.

Mr. JACOBSTEIN. Is not the fact emphasized that a man ought to be familiar with conditions in the district represented by him?

Mr. BROWNING. Yes. Now, mind you, when the draft of the Constitution was offered to the committee of five, the word "resident" was in there. Mr. Sherman moved to strike out that word and insert instead the word "inhabitant." Mr. Madison engaged in the discussion, and it was clearly the intention to put in that language, because Mr. Madison called attention to the fact that a man might be away on business, public or private, or pleasure, and it might be claimed by some man having spite against him that because of this temporary situation he was not a resident; and so the word "inhabitant" was inserted instead, because they wanted a man completely identified with the constituency which he represented. That is fundamental; it should be fundamental with the American Government to-day if we have any fundamentals. We should seek to guarantee a true representation of local sentiment, as it were, to present a cross section of the people's thoughts, to represent them truly in the more numerous branch of Congress. I believe Mr. Wilson expressed it when he said that they wanted a transcript of the people's mind.

Now, in the discussion of this change of verbiage, and elsewhere in the debate, these very men, Mr. Sherman and Mr. Wilson and Mr. Gouverneur Morris, all insisted that the Representatives should be elected every year. They said in substance, "We do not want a man to go away from his constituency and stay at the seat of government more than a year before he comes back and renders an account of himself to his constituents and permits them to determine whether he has taken on the esprit de corps of the locality of the Capitol."

Now, what about this as to Mr. BECK? He had been away from his constituency 23 years. During that length of time he had lived 17 years in the city of New York. My experience as a countryman is that if there is any place in this world that could get under a man's skin it is the city of New York. [Laughter.]

Mr. WELLER. I would like to ask the gentleman if he does not like to come to New York?

Mr. BROWNING. I do. It is a stupendous and magnificent city, ringing with the tumult of nocturnal pleasure, and other enjoyments. [Laughter.] However, it is a dangerous place for a man to go, regardless of where he has been raised. I do not care who he is. [Laughter.] I only spent about three weeks there at one time, and yet Mr. BECK stayed there for 17 years.

Mr. CAREW. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWNING. Yes.

Mr. CAREW. Do you think he is a Republican from New York? [Laughter.]

Mr. BROWNING. Well, I will say this to the gentleman: That I do not know whether he is or not, but I know the record discloses that he started out in very good company as an official under the Democratic administration in the State of Pennsylvania; that he then came to Washington, after he had changed his allegiance, which he had a perfect right to do, though I think he made a great mistake. Then he became a Republican official here. Then he went to New York and came back to Washington and held office under a Republican administration. I do not think the city of New York itself had anything to do with his becoming a Republican. They are not so indigenous to that city.

Mr. HASTINGS. I want to ask the gentleman one question.

Mr. BROWNING. Briefly, if you please.

Mr. HASTINGS. Does the gentleman state the record shows that Mr. BECK never ate a meal in this apartment nor his wife remained there a single night?

Mr. BROWNING. That is true.

Mr. VINCENT of Michigan. I do not think that is borne out by the record, if the gentleman pleases. Further than that, the gentleman from Tennessee, in giving the rooms of this apartment, left out the living room.

Mr. BROWNING. Possibly I did that, but it is a two-room apartment. May I ask the chairman what objection he has to the statement I made that Mr. BECK never ate a meal in this apartment? The record shows that, and that Mrs. Beck never spent a night there. The record shows that.

Mr. VINCENT of Michigan. I do not think the record shows that. It may possibly show that she did not eat a meal there, but she did stay there with Mr. BECK, according to the record.

Mr. BROWNING. I am positive the record shows different.

Mr. BLACK of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWNING. For a brief question.

Mr. BLACK of New York. Does the gentleman take the position that the fact that Mr. BECK maintained a home in the District of Columbia of itself disqualifies him as an inhabitant of the State of Pennsylvania?

Mr. BROWNING. Not at all. The position I take is this: That he not only maintained a home in Washington but occupied it as his place of abode. I do not claim that the fact that he bought himself a home in the District disqualifies him at all, but the fact that he is an inhabitant of the District of Columbia is the thing that disqualifies him.

Mr. GREEN. Where did his family reside?

Mr. BROWNING. His family resided here in Washington. Now, under any of the circumstances which you can find in this record, when Mr. BECK got through with the temporary duties he was performing, whether they were in the city of Philadelphia, whether they were in New York, or whether they were in Europe, he came to Washington where his home is. Now, the test of inhabitancy is the place where a man lives, to which he goes under all ordinary circumstances, the place where he has his family life, the place where his folk live, the place where he goes to when he is sick. Mind you, in this case, in 1926, Mr. BECK made, I believe, three speeches in the city of Philadelphia during that campaign; but after he finished on Saturday night before the election on Tuesday he came home to Washington. He was not even there to vote. Why? Because he was at home and not in Pennsylvania at all. He was sick in his regular place of abode.

Now, the chairman of the committee discusses this Key case. Let me show you the difference in that case and this one. Mr. Key made a declaration in the spring before this house was built, when he bought this farm, that he intended to build a home on it and to live in it himself. He did do that. He declared in the spring of the year that he was going to do it. He bought a part of his wife's family estate; he built a house on it for himself expressly; he went back to it and was living there at the time he was elected to Congress. He had moved his family there; he had taken his complete household, including his servants. And when he left Maryland and came to the District of Columbia he kept his law practice in Baltimore. He declined to take practice in the city of Washington at all, but he kept all of his activities there in Maryland. He was completely identified with that State except for the time he was a resident of the District; but he went back and qualified. There is too much of a disposition in this case to get the idea of citizenship and the idea of inhabitancy interwoven. They are not the same at all.

Take the Key case, for instance. At the time he was elected to Congress and got his seat from the State of Maryland, the law required a man to live in the State of Maryland for 12 months before he could vote. Key had only been there 18 days.

He was an inhabitant but he could not vote. He met the qualifications for a Member of Congress, yet he could not vote in his own election.

They are not the same at all, and I hope the House will not have that point disturbing their minds. Citizenship consists of an aggregation of civil privileges. Inhabitancy depends entirely on where a man lives and has his ordinary home.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWNING. Yes.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Does the evidence disclose whether or not Mr. BECK voted from the time he rented this apartment in Philadelphia until he was elected to Congress?

Mr. BROWNING. Here is what the record shows: In May, 1926, after it was determined that Mr. VARE was going to leave the House, while Mr. BECK was in Europe, out of order on the alphabetical list for assessment, Mr. BECK was listed exactly six months to a day before the election as a taxpayer for the payment of this occupational tax of 25 cents. If a man has been a citizen of Pennsylvania, he can go back and resume his citizenship with a six months' residence. He ignored that assessment. He was assessed twice in 1927, one time out of order, not on the regular alphabetical list, but picked up out of order. He ignored the first one, but the second one he paid just 11 days before the primary in which Mr. Hazlett, who had been elected to the House, was running for a county office. He voted in that primary on that poll-tax receipt, which was gotten as the chairman has indicated, 11 days after its purchase.

The law requires that the man shall either go to the office of the receiver of taxes and pay the poll tax himself or he must pay it to a deputy at one of the registration places on registration day, or he must have an agent do it on written authority from him. Mr. BECK had neither of these requirements complied with. There was no intention on his part, I concede, to violate the law; he is incapable of that; but I am asserting he had no right under the law to vote on that tax receipt in the primary election in September before he was elected in November.

Now, Mr. BECK very properly calls my attention to a statement I made in the minority report to the effect that a man had to have his poll-tax receipt 30 days, I believe, before the election. If I am wrong I want to correct that, because he insists that that does not apply to a primary. Since that time, when I told him I would correct it, I have gone further into the statute, and I confess I am not clear whether the law in Pennsylvania in that regard applies to primaries or not; but I know that in the State of Pennsylvania the law is specific that before a man can vote he must be a resident for a certain length of time, and the court goes on to describe this residence by saying:

> It means that place where the elector makes his permanent and true home, his principal place of business, and his family residence, if he has one; where he intends to remain indefinitely, and without a present intention to depart; when he leaves it he intends to return to it, and after his return he deems himself at home. (71 Pa. 302.)

This is a requirement for voting which Mr. BECK never met in the State of Pennsylvania.

Mr. GREEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWNING. Yes.

Mr. GREEN. How many times during the 20 years of his alleged residence in the city of Washington do the records disclose that he voted in Pennsylvania, if any?

Mr. BROWNING. The first time he voted was in this primary in 1927, and that is the only time he had voted for 20 years in the State of Pennsylvania when this proof was taken.

Now, as to inhabitancy, in the Bailey election case from Massachusetts which the chairman referred to——

Mr. STEAGALL. Will the gentleman yield for one question?

Mr. BROWNING. Yes.

Mr. STEAGALL. Reference has been made to Mr. BECK's membership in various clubs in the city of Philadelphia; did the committee ascertain whether or not he had membership in clubs in Washington or elsewhere as well as in Philadelphia?

Mr. BROWNING. Yes; I think he was a member of possibly one or two clubs in the city of Washington, but I will not be certain about that. But he always registered, when he registered away from the city of Washington, with his residence as Washington, D. C. He had all goods for his personal comfort sent to his residence here on Twenty-first Street. Everything tended to show he considered this his home and abode and, in reality, it was. There is no question about that in my mind.

Now, as to inhabitancy, in this Bailey case that has been referred to from Massachusetts, this man was appointed a clerk in the State Department by John Quincy Adams. He came here from his father's residence. He was a single man then and had lived in his father's home. He left his library back there. The proof tends to show he had expressed always the opinion and the conviction that he was still identified with Massachusetts and had his citizenship there, and even as great an authority as John Quincy Adams himself certified to that. He lived here for four years in a hotel and then he married in the District of Columbia. He had never exercised the rights of citizenship here, and people could vote here at that time. He had never done anything to contradict his conviction, often expressed, that he was still a citizen in full standing of Massachusetts. He was elected to Congress one year after he had married and moved into the home of his mother-in-law. They rejected him, and in the consideration of that case I want to read just this one statement:

After reviewing the circumstances attending the adoption of the clause of the Constitution, which I referred to a moment ago, the committee commented upon the fact that the word "resident" had first been proposed but had been put aside for "inhabitant" as being a "stronger term, intended to express more clearly their intention that the persons to be elected should be completely identified with the State in which they were to be chosen."

Now, here is a definition which, I think, is really the summing up of the definition of inhabitancy.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. BROWNING. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself 10 minutes more.

This is from Burrill's Law Dictionary:

> The Latin habitara, the root of this word, imparts by its very construction frequency, constancy, permanency, closeness of connection, attachment, both physical and moral; and the word "in" gives additional force to these senses.

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWNING. Yes.

Mr. DALLINGER. I understand that the gentleman is quoting from Bouvier's Law Dictionary?

Mr. BROWNING. No; from Burrill's.

Mr. DALLINGER. I notice that you do not cite Bouvier's Law Dictionary.

Mr. BROWNING. Oh, I am not willing to have the gentleman make my speech.

Mr. DALLINGER. Is the gentleman aware that in Bouvier's Law Dictionary the statement is made that "inhabitant" as used in the Federal jurisdiction act of 1789 means citizen, and there are two decisions of the Supreme Court confirming that?

Mr. BROWNING. I can cite the gentleman to cases from his own State that will refute that. An Illinois case decides that inhabitant is not synonymous with citizen. I will go on over to a Massachusetts case.

As used in the general statutes—section 11, paragraph 12—providing that all personal estate within or without the State shall be assessed to the owner in the city or town where he is an inhabitant on the 1st day of May, "inhabitant" does not mean any man who may happen to be personally in a town or a city, but means a man who has a home in a place, so any man who established a permanent home for himself and family, if he has one, and who there performs all the duties required of him.

There are a great many decisions, not only from the States of Illinois and Massachusetts, but from others, and this I get from the State of Delaware:

> A man may be a citizen without being an inhabitant of the State, as a man may be an inhabitant without being a citizen. This is not only an obvious distinction, but one which the Constitution itself makes, as in the qualification of voters it requires both citizenship and residence.

Here is another United States case:

> The term "inhabitant," as used in an act of Congress providing that no civil suit shall be brought before certain courts against an inhabitant of the United States by any original process in any other district than that whereof he is an inhabitant or in which he shall be found at the time of serving the writ, is a mere equivalent description of citizen and alien. A person might be an inhabitant without being a citizen, and a citizen might be an inhabitant though he retain his citizenship. Alienage or citizenship is one thing and inhabitancy, by which is understood local residence, annimo manendi, quite another.

That is in the case of Piquet v. Swan (U. S. 19 Fed. Cas. 609, 613).

I cite another from Fifth Federal:

> "Inhabitant," as used in Civ. Code Or., sections 1051, 1053, which declared that the jurisdiction to current letters of administration on the estate of a deceased person is vested in the county courts of the county of which the deceased was at or immediately before his death an inhabitant, means one who has an actual residence in the county or who is ordinarily personally present there, not merely in itinere, but as a resident and dweller therein. It is not the equivalent of the technical term "domicile."

The word "inhabitant" implies a more fixed and permanent abode than resident.

That is from another Federal case.

It comprehends locality of existence, the dwelling place where one maintains his fixed and legal settlement, not the casual and temporary abiding place which is required by the necessities of present surrounding circumstances. A mere sojourner is not an inhabitant in the sense of the act.

Mr. JACOBSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWNING. Yes.

Mr. JACOBSTEIN. If the report of the committee is sustained, what would prevent any wealthy man from renting a room anywhere within a State and getting himself elected by that subterfuge?

Mr. BROWNING. I think the door is wide open. It is not the immediate effect of seating Mr. BECK in this House that I am contending against. It is the precedent that you are going to set by leaving the situation such that where any kind of an organization, whether it be good or bad, can select any individual it chooses in the United States, establish a temporary, fly-by-night residence by renting an apartment, and sending him to Congress to serve any purpose they want.

I think this is a very serious matter. I think this is one thing that the fathers had in their minds as possible when they laid down this inhibition. It does not matter to me, except I want to relieve my mind of being convicted with regard to the true construction of the Constitution.

Reference was made a while ago to the establishment here in the District of Columbia of homes by men to live in who are in public life. That is not under consideration. I confess to you that a man has a perfect right to establish a home here which is incident to the discharge of his public duties.

But in this case Mr. BECK certainly can not go back of 1926, and the things that have developed since that time must govern his case. And in the beginning we find him with his permanent home established in the city of Washington. He never established it for the temporary purpose of representing these people in Congress, but he went to the district and established a temporary residence there in an attempt to qualify as a Member of Congress. He reversed the order entirely. Nobody else is endangered. It is whispered around that somebody else may be hit. I must insist that nobody is disqualified because he has a home in the city of Washington, but if this situation is so widespread as has been intimated in some quarters, then it is high time that we asserted what we understand to be the true meaning of the Constitution.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWNING. Yes.

Mr. GREEN. Was anything brought out in the record to show whether or not Mr. BECK had church membership in that district?

Mr. BROWNING. I do not remember anything about church membership.

Mr. GREEN. How about any lodge membership?

Mr. BROWNING. We discussed that, the clubs to which he belonged, but no fraternities that I have any recollection of.

Mr. PERKINS. Does not the record show that he was a trustee of the Episcopal Academy in Philadelphia?

Mr. BROWNING. That may be true, but that does not mean membership.

Mr. PERKINS. It is pretty close to membership.

Mr. BROWNING. I happen to belong to another church and I do not know what the requirements of membership are in that church.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Does not the only authority of the State of Pennsylvania quoted in the minority report at the top of page 17, in the final part of the decision, lay this down as the indispensable requisite of citizenship:

It means that place where the elector makes his permanent or true home, his principal place of business, and his family residence, if he has one; where he intends to remain indefinitely; and without a present intention to depart; when he leaves it he intends to return to it, and after his return he deems himself at home.

Mr. BROWNING. Yes.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Making the question a question of intention, just as suggested by the previous question?

Mr. BROWNING. No. It does not do that at all. It says "return." I regret my inability to explain to the gentleman what I am trying to talk about, and that is, that the expressed intention must be followed by his action, and he never acted in this case. He has lived in the District of Columbia, and has every month since November, 1920. It has been his permanent place of abode, where his wife lives and he had his home life.

Mr. DEMPSEY. My understanding of what the gentleman said was that he had an apartment and residence in the city of Philadelphia which he rented previous to his——

Mr. BROWNING. Just as a pretext in order to come to Congress. Mr. Speaker, I do not yield any further.

Mr. PERKINS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWNING. I will.

Mr. PERKINS. On page 34, Mr. BECK testified as follows:

The idea that I have not occupied that apartment constantly in the last year and a half is quite a mistake. That explains my allusion in my statement that a member of my family has occupied that apartment continually for the last year.

Mr. BROWNING. And, of course, he said he did not stay there while his sister was there after she came back from Europe six or eight months before he ran for Congress.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. VINCENT of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. BACHMANN].

Mr. BACHMANN. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, some question has developed as to whether or not Mr. BECK spent any time in his Philadelphia apartment, whether or not he lived there any part of the time. In this connection I want to refer the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BROWNING] to page 13 of the record in which Mr. BECK in his statement says:

On June 1, 1926, I rented an apartment at 1414 Spruce Street, which I have since maintained as my Philadelphia residence. It was an unfurnished housekeeping apartment, and I furnished it with all necessary furniture and equipment. This apartment my family and I have occupied from time to time, and one member almost continuously. Excluding the summer months, I am in Philadelphia nearly every week. My chief purpose in renting my Philadelphia apartment was not to obtain a seat in Congress, but to reidentify myself with my native city and Commonwealth as a citizen.

Let me, gentlemen of the House, take you a little further and show you exactly what Mr. BECK's intention was when he took this apartment. On page 58 of the record Mr. BECK says:

In taking that apartment when I rented it, the dominant purpose with me was to again establish a status in Philadelphia as one of its people. The seat in Congress was then a possibility undoubtedly, and I would not want to say, and could not say truthfully, that it had nothing to do with the renting of the apartment. It involved a very substantial sacrifice to me. But at least I would not want to be the kind of Washingtonian who was content to escape all civic responsibilities and duties, and I felt that I had all my life preached the duty of every citizen taking a part in politics and I wanted to have a status as a citizen, and that I could not have in Washington, and I established it in Philadelphia to do my civic duty.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Will you not read the next two sentences? Because there is a conflict with the previous statement. It is on page 58.

Mr. BACHMANN. I do not have a copy of the hearing before me.

Mr. DEMPSEY. I read:

Did you sleep there?

Mr. BECK. Many times.

Mr. BACHMANN. I understood that was the fact.

Mr. BRAND of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BACHMANN. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. BRAND of Georgia. Does the record show that Mr. Beck's sister was a member of his family?

Mr. BACHMANN. Yes. She lived in that apartment in Philadelphia.

Mr. BRAND of Georgia. I know; but prior to that time, when he was living with his wife, was his sister living with him and his wife?

Mr. BACHMANN. My recollection is that his sister spent most of her time in Europe, and that at other times she visited in Washington.

Mr. BRAND of Georgia. I did not know whether the gentleman had in mind Mr. BECK's sister as a part of his family.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BACHMANN. Yes, I yield.

Mr. KINCHELOE. I have not heard the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BROWNING] speak about Mr. and Mrs. Beck living in this apartment as man and wife.

Mr. BACHMANN. The only thing referred to by Mr. BECK as to that is that they would go there occasionally and occupy that apartment. If the gentleman wishes to bring out the fact as to where Mr. and Mrs. Beck lived most of the time, I think the record will show that they lived most of the time in Washington.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BACHMANN. I yield.

Mr. GREEN. Does the record disclose whether or not Mr. BECK owned property in Philadelphia, in this district, at the time of his election?

Mr. BACHMANN. I understand he owns real estate in Pennsylvania, but whether it is in this district or not I do not know.

Mr. GREEN. Does the evidence show that he voted in Philadelphia before that?

Mr. BACHMANN. He was a resident there all his life until he came to Washington. While he lived in Philadelphia he was Assistant United States Attorney and then United States Attorney, and voted there.

Mr. VINCENT of Michigan. The record shows that Mr. BECK was assessed for $30,000 of personal property in Philadelphia.

Mr. BACHMANN. Yes. He was assessed in 1926 and 1927.

Mr. NELSON of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BACHMANN. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. NELSON of Wisconsin. The Constitution requires a man to be an inhabitant. Where was Mr. BECK's inhabitancy—in Philadelphia or in Washington?

Mr. BACHMANN. We think it was in Philadelphia.

Mr. NELSON of Wisconsin. Can you have it in two places at one time?

Mr. BACHMANN. Not in my opinion. A man may have a dozen residences if he so desires, or three or four; but I do not think he can have two inhabitancies at the same time.

Mr. NELSON of Wisconsin. That was what I was trying to settle in my own mind. It must be dependent upon what the Constitution provides. A man can not have two inhabitancies.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Will the gentleman read from the record as to Mr. BECK's membership in the clubs? It has been referred to by Members on the other side.

Mr. BACHMANN. That has all been put in the record by the chairman of the committee, Mr. VINCENT of Michigan.

Mr. BUSBY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BACHMANN. Yes.

Mr. BUSBY. The fact that Mr. BECK remained in this apartment would not restrict his residence there if he was actually residing in Washington with his wife?

Mr. BACHMANN. No.

Mr. COCHRAN of Pennsylvania. I want to call the gentleman's attention to Mr. BECK's testimony on page 34 in answer to that question.

Mr. BACHMANN. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, the only question involved in the case of JAMES M. BECK is that growing out of Article I, section 2, of the Constitution, which provides:

> No person shall be a Representative who shall not have attained to the age of 25 years, and has been seven years a citizen of the United States, and who shall not, when elected, be an inhabitant of that State in which he shall be chosen.

Therefore, we are called upon to decide whether or not Mr. BECK was an inhabitant of the State of Pennsylvania within the meaning of the Constitution when he was elected.

The word "inhabitant" has many meanings. It has been construed to mean an occupant of lands; a resident; a permanent resident; one having a domicile; a citizen; a qualified voter. No exact definition can be given of the word "inhabitant" as applicable to all cases.

The Supreme Court of the United States has said that—

> In a statute providing that a majority of the inhabitants of the town, to be ascertained by an election, might authorize the issue of bonds the word "inhabitant" means legal voter. (Walnut v. Wade, 103 U. S. 683.)

That—

> "Inhabitant," as used in the statute of Henry the Eighth, concerning bridges and highways and providing that bridges and highways shall be made and repaired by the inhabitants of the city, has been construed to include those who hold lands within the city where the bridge is to be repaired lies, though they reside elsewhere. (Bank of the U. S. v. Deveaux, 9 U. S. (5 Cranch) 61.)

That—

> In the act of September 24, 1789, providing that no civil suit shall be brought against an inhabitant of the United States in any other district than that whereof he is an inhabitant, the term "inhabitant" means citizen. (Ex parte Shaw, 145 U. S. 444.)

That—

> On a change of domicile from one State to another citizenship may depend upon the intention of the individual. But this intention may be shown more satisfactorily by acts than declaration. An exercise of the right of suffrage is conclusive on the subject. (Shelton v. Tiffin, 6 Howard 163.)

That—

> The very idea of a political community, such as a nation is, implies an association of persons for the promotion of their general welfare. Each one of the persons associated becomes a member of the nation formed by the association. For convenience it has been found necessary to give a name to this membership. The object is to designate by a title the person and the relation he bears to the nation. For this purpose the words "subject," "inhabitant," and "citizen" have been used, and the choice between them is sometimes made to depend upon the form of government. "Citizen" is now more commonly employed. * * * It is understood as conveying the idea of membership of a nation. (Minor v. Happersett, 21 Wallace 162.)

One of the best definitions I have been able to find is that in the case of Howard College v. Gore (Mass. (5 Pick) 370):

> An inhabitant is one who, being a citizen, dwells or has his home in some particular town, where he has municipal rights and duties and is subject to particular burdens; and this habitancy may exist or continue notwithstanding an actual residence in another town or in another county.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. LAGUARDIA). The time of the gentleman from West Virginia has expired.

Mr. VINCENT of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman five additional minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from West Virginia is recognized for five additional minutes.

Mr. BACHMANN. In other words, gentlemen, we must reach a conclusion as to what the word "inhabitant" means.

It has been argued that the word "inhabitant" as used in the Constitution refers not to a political status but to physical presence. In this connection it is significant that the representation was to be for the State and not of the district, which in itself excludes the idea of physical presence in that neighborhood. This clearly indicates that the framers of the Constitution had in mind, by selecting the word "inhabitant," a political status and not a physical presence in a particular locality—the question of whether an individual owed allegiance, whether he was subject to the exactions of its laws, and whether he could share to the extent permitted in the benefits of the laws. To be an "inhabitant" of a State meant either an involuntary subjection to its laws by birth or a voluntary subjection to its laws by adoption. Always the idea has been one of political allegiance. Therefore it can be readily seen that the term "inhabitant" had no reference to the vague standard of whether an individual spent the greater part of a year in one place or another but referred to his political status.

I do not believe it can be seriously contended that Mr. BECK did not have a political status in Philadelphia. Therefore, if you believe to be an inhabitant of a State meant a political status, there is no question other than that Mr. BECK is clearly entitled to his seat.

Mr. NELSON of Wisconsin. If it was a political status it could not have any bearing on the District of Columbia at all?

Mr. BACHMANN. That is true. I am coming to that with respect to the Washington residence and the Philadelphia residence.

It should be kept in mind when talking about the Washington residence of Mr. BECK, whether we are talking about the same thing the Constitution requires in that portion requiring one to be an inhabitant of the State.

It is well settled throughout the United States that there are two kinds of residence—one permanent and legal, equivalent to domicile, the residence which makes citizenship, which establishes relation between the man and the State, and the other, the residence which consists in actual physical presence in a place other than a man's domicile. It has been held by courts of last resort over and over again that a man may have two residences, one his domicile and the other his actual residence.

It is clear, and no doubt will not be contradicted, that a man may have his domicile and the right to vote in Pennsylvania, and at the same time be a resident of the city of Washington.

Now, which of these two residences is meant by the Constitution. The universal rule throughout the Union is that the word "residence" when it refers to eligibility to office, means domicile; that is, permanent legal residence, and has no reference to where a man is actually living.

No man can be deprived of his citizenship, his domicile, his legal residence, against his will. No man can be deprived of it except by his own intention. Will anyone doubt that JAMES M. BECK tells the truth when he solemnly declares, as he does, that?—

from the time I sold my home in New York I had but one desire, and that was to establish a residence in Philadelphia and become again a citizen of that city. (P. 75, record.)

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from West Virginia has again expired.

Mr. VINCENT of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman three additional minutes.

Mr. BACHMANN. Can anyone doubt that Mr. BECK is telling the truth when he solemnly declares, as he does, that?—

I announced at a large public dinner in Philadelphia on April 30, 1925, that it was my intention to reidentify myself with Philadelphia. (P. 151, record.)

Can anyone doubt that Mr. BECK is telling the truth when he says?—

it being my intention to resume my citizenship in Philadelphia I ceased to vote in Sea Bright, N. J., after the presidential election of 1924. (P. 2 Beck statement.)

Can anyone doubt that Mr. BECK is telling the truth when in carrying out his intention to make Philadelphia his legal residence he said?—

I finally decided to acquire a permanent residence in that city, and on June 1, 1926, I rented an apartment at 1414 Spruce Street, which I have since maintained as my Philadelphia residence. (P. 3, Beck statement.)

Can anyone doubt that Mr. BECK is telling the truth, when in carrying out his intention to make Philadelphia his legal residence, he said?—

I was assessed as a taxpayer there in May, 1926, and again in December, 1926, and in May, 1927. I registered as a voter in Philadelphia in September, 1927, and voted in the primaries of September 20, 1927. (P. 3, Beck statement.)

Can anyone doubt that Mr. BECK is telling the truth when he said?—

Hardly a week goes by that I am not in Philadelphia, sometimes two or more nights. The fact that I transact my personal affairs there; that my personal fortunes are conducted in Philadelphia; that there I control my investments; and there I manage the property that I have; my identification with the city's civic interest—I think I can say without exaggeration, the unselfish identification that I have had in the civic enterprises in Philadelphia, all show my presence there is not an infrequent thing. (P. 17–18, extract from hearings.)

Will you believe, against the evidence, that Mr. BECK is still an inhabitant of New Jersey, and as well a citizen of that State, as contended by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KENT] on page 32 of the record? Will you believe, against the evidence, that it was not the intention of Mr. BECK to abandon his political status in the State of New Jersey? Will you believe, against the evidence, that it was not the intention of Mr. BECK to reidentify himself with the city of Philadelphia and the State of Pennsylvania, the State of his birth, the home of his father; the city and State that had showered honors on his youth and had more honors in store for his manhood; the State of his nativity, of his ambition, and his pride.

Can anyone contend that he intended to abandon that and take up his residence in the one place in the United States where residence gives no political rights and offers no future to ambition and to hopes—the District of Columbia?

To Mr. BECK alone belongs the privilege of acquiring inhabitancy or citizenship in any State in the Union. That it was his intention to do so in Pennsylvania is beyond doubt. That his acts and deeds in furtherance of that intention beyond question establishes his inhabitancy and citizenship. Having thus subjected himself to the burdens of taxation, the burden of renting a habitation, the burdens of jury service, the burdens under the succession law under which the State of Pennsylvania will take some portion of his estate when he passes on, he surely is entitled to the enjoyment of those privileges similarly enjoyed by all other citizens and inhabitants of that great State. To deny him his seat as a Member of the House of Representatives from the State of Pennsylvania would only mean the taking from him of certain obligations and services and deprive him of his constitutional right of making himself an inhabitant and citizen of one of the States of this Union, a right enjoyed by all citizens and inhabitants of the United States under the Constitution. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from West Virginia has again expired.

Mr. BROWNING. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. COLE].

Mr. COLE of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, ladies, and gentlemen of the House, as a member of the same profession with Mr. BECK, as a member of the American Bar Association and the Supreme Court bar of this country, I have the greatest respect for his ability and learning; but when by an effort, such as this record presents, short of trickery he attempts to manipulate the provisions of the Constitution of this country to gain a seat in this House I am most willing to take my stand against him.

The majority report from the Committee on Elections No. 2, coupled with Mr. BECK's own statements before the committee, is such an ingenious and unprecedented manipulation of sound and common sense interpretation of the constitutional provisions involved it becomes necessary at the outset to consider the facts in order to locate, if possible, some reason therefor. The facts—taken from the committee's reports—bearing on the issues I shall discuss can be briefly stated as follows:

Mr. BECK's early life was spent in Pennsylvania, he being born and educated there. In 1900 he moved to Washington to accept an appointment as Assistant Attorney General of the United States. This position he resigned in 1903 when he went to the city of New York to practice law. At the same time he abandoned his residence in Philadelphia and acquired a fixed domicile in New York City. He continued to reside in New York City until November, 1920.

In the intervening period between 1903 and 1920 he acquired a summer home at Sea Bright, N. J., which property he still owns, and at which place he registered and voted as late as the presidential election in 1924. This voting status in New Jersey he retained in November, 1927, and, so far as we are advised, at the present time. So far as the New Jersey authorities are concerned, no act of Mr. BECK has shown withdrawal of claim for voting privileges in that State. Mrs. Beck enjoyed the same voting status, and it is fair to assume she still does, even from the standpoint of intention, because not by the greatest stretch of imagination could she qualify as a resident or inhabitant of Pennsylvania. In 1920 Mr. BECK sold his residence in New York City and came to Washington and purchased a home he has owned since at 1624 Twenty-first Street NW. Between June, 1921, and June, 1925, Mr. BECK served as Solicitor General of the United States. Upon resigning that position in June, 1925, he established a law office in Washington and also resumed his connection with the old law firm in New York. At no time since 1900 has he retained a law office in Pennsylvania or practiced law there. In the spring of 1926 he inspected several apartments in the first congressional district in Philadelphia, and on the 6th day of July following he executed a lease of date June 1, 1926, for a 2-room apartment at 1414 Spruce Street. The apartment is equipped with kitchenette, but Mr. BECK has never eaten a meal there; it has one bedroom and that has been occupied continuously by his unmarried sister, Miss Helen Beck; Mrs. Beck has lived at the Washington home continuously since its purchase and no claim is made that the apartment in Philadelphia aforesaid was for her use or convenience in any way. Mr. BECK always registers as from Washington when he goes to hotels throughout the country, this being true during the life of the aforesaid lease. He has his merchandise for personal comfort sent to his Washington home; he has his automobiles for every use registered in the District of Columbia. At no time has he treated the small 2-room apartment in Philadelphia, located—as I think fair to submit, in a locality as different in point of environment, value, and habit from that which Mr. BECK has been and is now accustomed to, as day is from night. It is fair to state that the facts in no particular indicate or convince one that Mr. BECK's rental of this apartment presented to him in any sense a real and bona fide habitation.

The lease must have been entered into as an attempt, now appearing to be of the weakest kind, to comply with the constitutional requirement for an inhabitant. On the 9th day of September, 1927, Mr. BECK has delivered to him in the office of Mr. VARE his occupational-tax receipt, for which the sum of 25 cents was paid. Considerable doubt exists as to his compliance with the registration laws of Pennsylvania, but this I shall not discuss. He then registered as a voter in the primaries in the city of Philadelphia in September, 1927, at which primary, Mr. Hazlett, a relative of Mr. VARE, was the candidate for Representative from the first district to succeed Mr. VARE. After the primaries, Mr. Hazlett, having been nominated, resigned, and to fill the vacancy so caused by the Republican authorities nominated Mr. BECK. The election was held November 6, 1927, but Mr. BECK did not come from his Washington home to vote, although it is reported on election night he attended a Washington dinner party.

It is certainly germane to the issue before the House to discover, if possible, some reason for Mr. BECK—a man standing high in the legal profession and enjoying an enviable reputation as a constitutional lawyer—to attempt such a flimsy, loose, and unprecedented plan to gain a seat in this House. Let us remove the smoke screen which is prevalent all through Mr. BECK's testimony and argument and try to find some reason. It is a known fact that Mr. VARE in 1926, then the Representative of the district Mr. BECK now represents, was a candidate for the United States Senate, and on November 2 of that year was elected to the United States Senate. Difficulty in sustaining his right to a seat in the United States Senate was anticipated, and Mr. BECK during the year 1926 must have been counseling and advising Mr. VARE, because in that year Mr. BECK published his book entitled "The Vanishing Rights of the States." It takes but a child to read this book and discover it to be nothing but a brief in behalf of Mr. VARE. It is interesting also to know that the morning after the election in Philadelphia, at which Mr. BECK did not vote but was elected, that he issued from his Washington office a statement to the press, declaring the Philadelphia election has "vindicated Mr. VARE."

Our familiarity with developments in the Vare case before the Senate during the present session of Congress, and the knowledge that Mr. BECK is still chief counsel for Mr. VARE, coupled with the prior association I have attempted to discuss, presents most forcibly reasons as to why Mr. BECK so hastily attempted to secure the status of an inhabitant of Pennsylvania, and later a Representative from a boss-ridden district in Philadelphia, where his election was at the will of his client and the vote so certain and meaningless from a personal standpoint that he himself did not take the time to journey from his real residence and habitation in Washington to participate therein.

The doctrine of State's rights is not involved in this controversy. However, I am not surprised it is brought forth, because in Mr. BECK's desperation, he, like a drowning man grabbing at a straw, seeks to maintain his rights through the help of every conceivable line of reasoning. It is doubtful if Mr. BECK, when he penned his work, The Vanishing Rights of the States, expected the issue of State's rights to be presented in a case such as his personal claim for a seat in this House now presents, for he says in that book (p. 49):

> This provision (speaking of the section of the Constitution designating each House as the judge of the qualifications of its Members) unquestionably invests each House with the right to determine whether a man who claims to have been elected to either House was in fact elected, and if so, whether he possesses the requisite qualifications, but these qualifications are obviously those which have already been prescribed in the Constitution as to age, the period of his citizenship, and the fact that he is an inhabitant of the State which he seeks to represent.

Was Mr. BECK at the time of his election an inhabitant of the State of Pennsylvania in the sense that the law requires?

Paragraph 2 of section 2, article 1, of the Constitution provides as follows:

> No person shall be a Representative who shall not have attained the age of 25 years and been 7 years a citizen of the United States, and who shall not, when elected, be an inhabitant of that State in which he shall be chosen.

It is the last part of the aforegoing paragraph of the Constitution which this House is called upon to interpret at this time. The answer given by the House to-day is, therefore, one of national policy and of extreme importance.

The majority report in this matter, discussing the aforesaid constitutional provisions of page 4 of that report, says:

> To determine whether the facts applicable to the case of Mr. BECK places him within the meaning of the framers of the Constitution in their use of the word "inhabitant," it is of the the greatest importance to consider the debate which occurred at the time this provision was adopted.

I quote this because the majority report recognizes the fact that in disposing of Mr. BECK's rights the word "inhabitant" must not be too strictly construed, but that the intent and purpose thereof as disclosed by the debate upon that provision as contained in the Madison Papers be considered. These debates, as furnished us by Mr. Madison and set forth to some extent in the committee reports and in Mr. BECK's brief, are very interesting; but as they are all used finally by Mr. BECK as a basis for the argument that Washington and Franklin were not inhabitants of Virginia and Pennsylvania, respectively, unless he, Mr. BECK, is regarded by the Members of this House as an inhabitant of Pennsylvania, I ignore that argument, because obviously it contains no merit. This House has to determine whether Mr. BECK was an inhabitant of Pennsylvania in a sense that the Members of this House approve, and I can not conceive of the issue being disposed of upon party alignment or personal prejudice. It should be met in fairness and in furtherance of the commonly accepted understanding of the people of this country as to the status of citizenship a Representative in this House should enjoy. Mr. BECK is most desperate in his own behalf in this case. It is astounding (in view of what I shall say hereafter), to read on pages 5 and 6 of his brief the following language:

> You will thus see that the convention divided upon the use of the word "resident," thereby meaning a stricter physical presence, and "inhabitant," thereby meaning a member of a political community. It can not be questioned that the word "resident" was a stricter term, for it imported the idea of containing physical presence.
> If, however, as I shall argue, to be an "inhabitant" referred not to physical presence but to a political status, he could not, when elected, be an inhabitant of the State unless he had previously accepted by birth or adoption, as a member of that political community.
>
> Moreover, it is significant that the Representative was to be for the State, and not of the district, which in itself excludes this idea of neighborhood and of physical presence in that neighborhood. This indicates that they had in mind by selecting the word "inhabitant" a political status, and not a physical presence in a particular locality.
>
> * * * And yet the Constitution provided that the people of Pittsburgh might, if they chose, select as their Representative a citizen of Philadelphia who had never lived in their midst, and whom, personally, none of them ever knew. In fact, all of the 35 Members of the Pennsylvania delegation could, if the people of Pennsylvania so elected, be selected from the residents of one particular district even at this time.

Further quoting, page 13:

> What they [framers of the Constitution] wanted to do was to lay down a rule that would be easily susceptible of application. In this they wholly failed, if by "inhabitant" they meant resident in the physical sense.

Further quoting, page 15:

> Having thus given my interpretation of the Constitution, which at least has the advantage of being practical and reasonable and not general and indeterminate—then I may add that it at least has the advantage of the sanction of history—it is not necessary to say much in applying it to the facts in my case.

Further quoting, page 16:

> Where I purchased and maintained a home, by the maintenance of a house in Washington, meaning thereby a legal residence in Washington, has never been regarded as an abandonment of the right to retain or acquire the rights of citizenship in one of the States.

I think all of us will admit that inhabitancy and citizenship and residence is largely a question of intention on the part of the individual. At the same time it is admitted with equal force that such intention is always gathered from the facts and not by some secret resolve on the part of the individual. It is an insult to the intelligence of this House to argue from the facts presented in Mr. BECK's behalf that he was a bona fide inhabitant of Pennsylvania at the time of his election. Aside from the secret resolve on his own part, which he himself now says he possessed to become an inhabitant of Pennsylvania, the record presents nothing of force and merit to his advantage.

May I have two more minutes?

Mr. BROWNING. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman two additional minutes.

Mr. BACHMANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLE of Maryland. Not at this time. I have no doubt had some hack politician instead of a man of Mr. BECK's standing attempted a trick of this kind, we would have been enjoying the mastery and sound interpretation of our Constitution by Mr. BECK protesting against the assault upon the Constitution which such a case would have presented.

I recall on one occasion, before the Supreme Court of the United States, a certain lawyer of recognized ability was presenting his argument and in doing so submitted certain legal propositions as being sound and applicable to his case. He was interrupted, as I recall, by Justice Holmes, with this remark, "Mr. (Blank), the reasoning you have just advanced is directly contrary to that which you state in your work on Pleading and Practice." The lawyer answered, "If that is the case, then my book is wrong." It is needless for me to say that the court sustained the authority in this great lawyer's book, which was, of course, his sound, sane, and real interpretation of the law and not that which happened to fit the particular case he was arguing at that time. Mr. BECK, you know, is the author of a very delightful book entitled: "The Constitution of the United States." It was published in 1924. As a caption to chapter 10, page 124, he places these words from Lowell:

> Once to every man and nation comes the moment to decide,
> In the strife of truth with falsehood, for the good or evil side.

Bearing in mind what I have heretofore said and supplementing that with the knowledge you possess of Mr. BECK's argument and the effort of the majority report in this matter to sustain his right to a seat in this House, see if you can reconcile that attitude and that interpretation of the Constitution with Mr. BECK's own language in the very wonderful work by him which I have just quoted. On page 281 we find Mr. BECK discoursing as follows:

Lord Brunnel then suggests that the governmental institutions of England and France give a greater opportunity to public service than America. Unquestionably, our institutions, with their tendency toward localization, do not make for national leadership. For example, in England a man can run for Parliament in any district. Even if defeated in one district he may stand for another seat, but in America a man can not run for Congress unless he is a citizen of the State in which he is situated; and while in theory, if a Pennsylvanian he can be a candidate for any congressional district of that populace Commonwealth, yet in actual practice—because the habits of the people are always as much a part of its constitution as the written law—the opportunity to serve the Nation in the Halls of Congress is dependent upon the consent of the district of his residence.

[Applause.]

I might add that Mr. BECK is not alone in the aforegoing interpretation of our Constitution as to the requirements of one seeking representation in Congress, for we find Beard, on American Government and Politics, page 232, expressing a similar view. I find comfort and satisfaction in the position I have taken in this controversy from the language of the Court of Appeals of Maryland, the State I represent. Naturally there is confusion from time to time as to the right of certain residents of the District of Columbia temporarily residing in Maryland, voting there. Permit me to quote therefore the language of Justice Bryan in the case of Thomas v. Warner, Eighty-third Maryland, pages 19, 20, and 21:

Warner was undoubtedly a resident of Washington from 1885 to 1892. It was in his power to remove his residence to Maryland if he thought proper to do so. It was a very easy thing to do. If he had broken up his establishment in Washington, abandoned his residence there, and made his home in Montgomery, there could have been no question about the matter. But sometimes the change of residence can not be proved by clear and unambiguous evidence. It must, however, always appear that the former residence has been abandoned. There must be an actual acquisition of a new abode; and in the case of a married man the settlement of the family there with all the incidents and associations belonging to a home according to their circumstances. The idea of residence is compounded of fact and intention; to effect a change of it there must be an actual removal to another habitation, and there must be an intention of remaining there. It is not required that the purpose to remain shall be unalterable; for a person may change his residence whenever his wishes or his interests may induce him to do so. But there must be an adoption of the new abode as a place of fixed present domicile; it would ordinarily be the "center of his affairs," and the place where the business of his life was transacted. Of course, no one thinks that a man is obliged to remain at home as if he were a prisoner. His business might require him to be absent on frequent occasions for longer or shorter periods. But his home is the place where he and his family habitually dwell; which they leave for temporary purposes, and to which they return when the occasion for absence no longer exists. * * *

We have seen that Mr. Warner's election to change his residence would not be sufficient without making the new habitation a place of fixed present domicile. Now, we see in the evidence no change in the course of his life in Washington after he purchased the land and built the house in Montgomery. He continued to live at his former dwelling and, as far as we can see from the evidence, under the same conditions and circumstances. He paid taxes on his personal property in the same way as formerly, as only a resident is required to do; and there is no external mark or indication which would designate him as a transient dweller or sojourner. Although he and his family paid visits to his country house, we have seen that such visits were by no means inconsistent with a residence in Washington. * * * Judge Story tells us that: "In a strict and legal sense that is properly the domicile of a person where he has his true, fixed, permanent home and principal establishment, and to which, whenever he is absent, he has the intention of returning (animus revertendi). We find it impossible to infer that these conditions are fulfilled in the case of the Montgomery house."

This House is one of the most precious instruments of our Government, and I for one believe the good people of this country intend that its membership shall in every way respect the sane, common-sense construction of paragraph 2, section 2, Article I, of the Constitution, and comply with its provisions before they should knock at the doors for entrance, and above all else before they should attempt to hold a seat in this House. Sad and unfortunate as it may be in the case of Mr. BECK, a man who has served this Government; a man who at a time when his better judgment was not influenced as it evidently has been since 1926, gave to us his splendid work on the Constitution from which I have quoted; and a man who necessarily stands high in the legal profession of this country, of which I am a member. I hope the intelligence of this House will assert itself to-day and, free from party alignment, political affiliation, stamp its disapproval upon the manner in which Mr. BECK has gained his seat on this floor. It is a sad spectacle to find a living being serving as a pallbearer at the funeral of his own reputation, but to present that commitment to Mr. BECK is in my judgment our solemn and binding duty.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Maryland has expired.

Mr. VINCENT of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, what is the situation with respect to the time?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan has 22 minutes remaining and the gentleman from Tennessee 28 minutes.

Mr. BROWNING. Mr. Speaker, I would like to inquire if that is not a wrong check of the time? I have used only 47 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is informed by the time clerk that that is correct.

Mr. BROWNING. Mr. Speaker, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KENT].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is recognized for 28 minutes.

Mr. KENT. Mr. Speaker, with the permission of the Speaker and Members of the House, this House has an unusual and extraordinary opportunity of reestablishing and reaffirming a precedent in this case which has come down from the very foundation of the Government; and in this connection may I call attention to the fact that the Elections Committee was the first committee that was appointed by the First Congress. So, we have the extreme pleasure of participating before the first committee that was ever established by the Congress of the United States, which has always been extremely jealous of its dignity and of its ability to control the proceedings of the House of Representatives, according to the precedents of the House itself.

Somewhere throughout the arguments in some of the precedents it was endeavored to be established that upon this question of inhabitancy, or any other question affecting the qualifications of Members of Congress, the Congress should leave the matter to the particular States from which a representative claimed a seat, in order that that particular State should itself fix what it believed was the proper rule affecting inhabitancy. But I do not believe that it will be even slightly contended that the State, or any State of the Union, has, under our Constitution, any right to fix the qualifications for a Representative.

The qualifications, of course, are fixed in the Constitution, and by a separate section of the Constitution, only the time and the manner and the place of holding elections are left to the States themselves.

Therefore, in the principal case which has come down to us, the Congress at the very outset called attention to the fact that it was jealous of its jurisdiction, and that it was the exclusive judge in determining the qualifications of its Members.

Before going into an analysis of the facts, as I will read them in chronological order, I may again state what the minority leader stated in bringing this matter to the attention of the committee.

No possible political advantage can be gained in this matter by any party now represented in this House of Representatives. Numerically we all understand how the great political parties are represented in this House. We also understand, from common knowledge, that the minority in this House could not possibly procure a seat if this matter were decided adversely to the sitting Member. By a long line of precedents it has been definitely established that even though the gentleman who received the second highest number of votes in this matter were contesting, he could not possibly be entitled to this seat if Mr. BECK were held to be disqualified.

So, from the first congressional district of Pennsylvania, if Mr. BECK is not qualified to sit, unquestionably some one of the same political faith will succeed him, and no party advantage can therefore be obtained by the minority in this House; and by reason of the minority now existing, no party advantage can be obtained by the majority in this House.

The second section of Article I of the Constitution provides—and in order that it may be fresh in our minds I will read it now:

The House of Representatives shall be composed of Members chosen every second year by the people of the several States and the electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State legislature. No person shall be a Representative who shall not have attained the age of 25 years and been seven years a citizen of the United States, and who shall not, when elected, be an inhabitant of that State in which he shall be chosen.

The facts are as follows:

1. JAMES M. BECK was born in Philadelphia on July 9, 1861, and was educated in the public schools there and later in Moravian College at Bethlehem, Pa.

2. In 1884 he was admitted to the Philadelphia bar.

3. His statement read in the record from the printed statement released for publication January 7, 1928, is silent upon the fact that in the first term of President Cleveland he was appointed assistant United States district attorney for the eastern district of Pennsylvania and served in that capacity for four years. (See p. 38 of hearings.)

4. As the result of presidential appointment of President Cleveland in the latter's second term, Mr. BECK served for four years as United States district attorney for the same district.

5. In 1900 he was appointed Assistant Attorney General by President McKinley, moved to Washington, retained his voting residence in Philadelphia, and resigned that position in 1903. (See p. 38.)

6. At the age of 42 Mr. BECK went to New York in 1903 to practice law in order to secure a competence. (See p. 39.)

7. He remained in New York until November, 1920. (See p. 39.)

8. He owned at different times two homes in New York City, both of which were sold at or about November, 1920. (See p. 39.)

9. He purchased a property in Sea Bright, N. J., about 25 years ago, owning the fee simple. He is still possessed of the fee-simple title to that real estate.

10. He voted in New York up until the time of his removal from that State.

11. He paid personal-property and real-estate taxes in Sea Bright, N. J., in 1921 and having removed to Washington was qualified to vote in New Jersey in 1921, and did then and thereafter, until 1926, at least, maintain intentionally a voting status in New Jersey.

12. He was in a similar position in 1922 and voted in Sea Bright, N. J., in the congressional elections of that year.

13. He paid personal-property and real-estate taxes in Sea Bright, N. J., in 1923 but failed to vote that year.

14. He paid personal-property and real-estate taxes at Sea Bright, N. J., in 1924 and voted by mail, as did his wife, at Sea Bright, N. J., in the presidential elections of that year.

15. He paid personal-property and real-estate taxes at Sea Bright, N. J., for 1925.

16. He paid personal-property and real-estate taxes at Sea Bright, N. J., for 1926.

17. He paid personal-property and real-estate taxes at Sea Bright, N. J., for 1927.

18. The Sea Bright, N. J., property is a large, handsome, and expensive property on the ocean front. Mr. BECK rented that property and had it for sale until the summer of 1927, and in that summer he withdrew the property from sale and used it himself.

19. The Sea Bright, N. J., property is in the custody of the caretaker, who lives upon it, and he together with his wife are qualified voters of New Jersey.

20. After the presidential elections in 1924 in which Mr. and Mrs. Beck voted, no other acts were performed by them until 1926 showing they were not entitled to vote in the State of New Jersey nor showing withdrawal of claims to voting privileges in that State.

21. In November of 1920, being assured that he would be connected with the Harding administration in some capacity, he sold his property in New York and acquired, about November, 1920, the fee simple at 1624 Twenty-first Street NW., in Washington, D. C. He resided in Washington from November, 1920, until June of 1921 without any official connection with the United States Government.

22. He retained his law office in New York City from November, 1920, up to the time he became Solicitor General in June, 1921, by President Harding's appointment.

23. He still owns that property in Washington, D. C. (See p. 40.)

24. In 1925 he resigned as Solicitor General and opened a law office in the Southern Building in Washington, D. C. (See p. 65.)

25. He is now, and was when elected to Congress, residing principally and exclusively at 1624 Twenty-first Street NW., Washington, D. C., without change of status which began in November, 1920, excepting that he in May, 1925, long prior to his election to Congress, opened a law office in the Southern Building in the National Capital.

26. He has no law office in Philadelphia, having ceased to practice there in 1900, and has nothing more in that city than an alleged voting residence acquired through the execution of an alleged lease on July 6, 1926. (See p. 43.)

27. Mr. BECK is married and has two children. Both children are in Europe and he resides with his wife at his Washington address, excepting that in the summer of 1927 he resided with her at Sea Bright, N. J.

28. He is associated in the law practice in Washington, D. C., with several other lawyers in the same suite of offices, and department records show that these lawyers practice before all governmental departments.

29. His name appears in the telephone book in Washington, D. C., as a resident at 1624 Twenty-first Street NW. and as an attorney in the Southern Building, and he maintains telephones at both places.

30. His automobiles are registered in Washington, D. C., and he never had an automobile registered or licensed in the State of Pennsylvania. (See p. 66.)

31. The home in Washington, D. C., is large and commodious, containing on the ground floor leading from Twenty-first Street a reception room, a den or office in which Mr. BECK spends some of his time with some of his books; on the second floor there are many books in the large library, sitting room, reception room, dining room, and other rooms. On the next two floors there are rooms for Mr. BECK's family, guests, and servants. There are four servants in the Washington home and a chauffeur who operates two of Mr. BECK's automobiles which are in operation and cares for an additional one not in operation. (See pp. 64–65.)

33. Mr. BECK has been for his entire lifetime a voracious reader and has written several books. He has, according to his estimate, a large comprehensive library of several thousand volumes, covering a wide variety of subjects.

34. In Philadelphia he has no books, estimated by himself at less than half a dozen.

35. According to his own statement, all that he holds dear in life, including his books, furnishings, works of art, and things of like character, are in his Washington home.

36. At 1414 Spruce Street, Philadelphia, there is an apartment house known as the Richelieu, partly owned and altogether controlled by Albert M. Greenfield, Philadelphia real-estate operator, prominent in organization politics in Philadelphia.

37. On July 6, 1926, a lease was alleged to have been entered into between Greenfield and Mr. BECK for two rooms, kitchenette, and bath on the second floor of that apartment house.

38. In this apartment Mr. BECK has never eaten a meal. (See p. 59.)

39. According to his claim, his sister resides there almost continuously, and when she occupies it he himself does not sleep there. Since she occupies the same continuously, he does not sleep there except perhaps rarely.

40. The apartment contains one bedroom.

41. The janitor of the apartment, admittedly without credibility, stated on one occasion that he had seen Mr. BECK in the apartment house only three times in 1927 and about 15 times from July, 1926, to the present time. He was friendly to Mr. BECK on the stand.

42. After having used the apartment himself, he turned the same over during a part of 1926 for the temporary use of a Mr. Ackerson, who held a position with the Sesquicentennial Exposition at Philadelphia.

43. Mr. BECK had not and has no clothes in that apartment, nor has any other member of his family except perhaps his sister. His clothes are taken in and out of the apartment only when he visits the same. (See p. 59.)

44. He has bank accounts in Washington, New York, Philadelphia, London, Paris, and Geneva.

45. Up to the present time he has paid only 25 cents in taxes in the State of Pennsylvania since his alleged removal back to Pennsylvania.

46. He has not submitted himself to taxation in 1926 and 1927, although claiming to be an inhabitant of Pennsylvania and subject to its laws.

47. He failed to submit himself to the taxing power of Pennsylvania by making full disclosure of taxable property in that State when requested so to do at or about the time of his election and by default after the election he was arbitrarily assessed at $20,000. At no time did he perform any legal duty requiring him to submit himself to taxation.

48. At the time of his election and with his knowledge he was a nonresident member of the Art Club, Philadelphia, and the Franklin Inn Club, of Philadelphia, and at the same time he was a resident member of the Metropolitan Club, of Washington, D. C. In the Art Club, of Philadelphia, a nonresident member is one who resides more than 50 miles beyond the city. In the Metropolitan Club, of Washington, a nonresident member is one who resides 30 miles beyond the city. (See p. 70.)

49. Mr. BECK knowingly remained upon the nonresident members' list of the Art Club of Philadelphia until January 1, 1928.

50. During 1926, up to his election on November 8, 1927, he registered at hotels in Philadelphia without exception as a resident of Washington, D. C. After his election in 1927 he, without exception, continued to register at Philadelphia hotels as a resident of Washington, D. C.

51. In his correspondence with the Union League of New York in ordering cigars and directing his bills to be sent to certain designations Mr. BECK always referred to "my residence at 1624 Twenty-first Street NW., Washington, D. C.," and "my Sea Bright, N. J., home." On one occasion, in a lengthy correspondence extending through 1926, 1927, and 1928, he directed cigars to be sent to the Art Club at Philadelphia. At no time did he refer to a home residence, habitation, or domicile at 1414 Spruce Street, Philadelphia.

I have read the clause in the Constitution which refers to qualifications for a Representative in Congress. I will ask the House to bear with me while I read that part of the clause in the Constitution which fixes the qualifications for Senators.

On page 12 of the House Manual and Digest we find the following:

> No person shall be elected a Senator who shall not have attained to the age of 30 years and been 9 years a citizen of the United States, and who shall not, when elected, be an inhabitant of that State for which he shall be chosen.

It will be noted that the Constitution retained the word "inhabitant" in both classes, fixing qualifications for both branches of the Congress.

Then, in fixing the qualifications for the Executive, on page 48 of the House Manual, we find the framers used the following language:

> No person except a natural-born citizen or a citizen of the United States at the time of the adoption of this Constitution shall be eligible to the office of President. Neither shall any person be eligible to that office who shall not have attained to the age of 35 years and been 14 years a resident within the United States.

It will there be noted that the framers used the word "inhabitant" of particular States when they fixed qualifications for both branches of the National Legislature; but when fixing the qualifications for President, intentionally and in order to care for certain persons like Alexander Hamilton and others, they fixed 14 years as the period of residence, but used, distinctly and unqualifiedly, the word "resident" instead of the word "inhabitant," so that it would not be necessary for the President to be at the particular time an inhabitant of a particular State, but he could be a resident out through the United States.

In the twelfth amendment, in article 12, the following language is again significantly used. This is with regard to the meeting of the Electoral College. It is found at page 78 of the House Manual.

> The electors shall meet in their respective States and vote by ballot for President and Vice President, one of whom at least shall not be an inhabitant of the same State with themselves.

Again designedly using the word "inhabitant."

But, very significantly, in our Constitution, in article 14, a great many of our difficulties have been swept away when we come to define the word "inhabitant" with regard to the qualifications for membership of the House of Representatives. There citizenship is defined, on page 82 of the House Manual and Digest:

> All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States of the State wherein they reside.

So it would appear, as we go through the different sections of the Constitution, that the framers were endeavoring to define citizenship. They were not insisting that a citizen be an inhabitant of a State. They did not insist that the President should be a specific inhabitant of a State, or any particular State of which he was an inhabitant at the time of his election, but that he needed to be only 14 years a resident of the United States.

But, significantly—so significantly that it must challenge the attention of the committee—when they fixed the qualifications for Members of the National Legislature they insisted that they be inhabitants of the State from which they came when elected.

In a discussion of this character it is well to go to the fountainhead of our knowledge upon the subject, and I therefore quote from volume 3 of Documentary History of the Constitution, December, 1899, beginning on page 471. On Wednesday, August 8, 1787, and, of course, prior to the report of the committee on style the identical article and section in question were before the convention for consideration. We find the following language on the above page:

> Mr. Sherman, moved to strike out the word "resident" and insert "inhabitant," as less liable to misconstruction.
> Mr. Madison 2ded the motion. both were vague, but the latter ("less liable" stricken out) least so in common acceptation, and would not exclude persons absent occasionally for a considerable time on public or private business. Great disputes had been raised in Virg[a]. concerning the meaning of residence as a qualification of Representatives which were determined more according to the affection or dislike to the man in question, than to any fixt interpretation of the word.
>
> Mr. Gov. Morris was opposed to both and for requiring nothing more than a freehold. He quoted great disputes in N. York occasioned by these terms, which were decided by the arbitrary will of the majority. Such a regulation is not necessary. People rarely chose a nonresident—It is improper as in the 1st. branch, the people at large, not the States are represented.
>
> Mr. Rutlidge urged & moved that a residence of 7 years shd be required in the State Wherein the Member shd be elected. An emigrant from N. England to S. C. or Georgia would know ("as" stricken out) less of its affairs and could not be supposed to acquire a thorough knowledge in less time.
>
> Mr. Read reminded him that we were now forming a Nat[l] Gov[t] and such a regulation would correspond little with the idea that we were one people.
>
> Mr. Wilson enforced the same consideration.
>
> Mr. MERCER. Such a regulation would present a greater alienship among the States than ("n" written upon "t") existed under the old federal system. It would interweave local prejudices & State distinctions in the very Constitution which is meant to cure them. He mentioned instances of violent disputes raised in Maryland ("under these" stricken out) concerning the term "residence."
>
> Mr. Elseworth thought seven years of residence was by far too long a term but that some fixt term of previous resident would be proper. He thought one year would be sufficient, but seemed to have no objection to three years.
>
> Mr. Dickenson ("s" effaced) proposed that it should read inhabitant actually resident for ——— year. This would render the meaning less indeterminate.
>
> Mr. WILSON. If a short term should be inserted in the bank, ("it might" stricken out) so strict an expression might be construed to exclude the members of the Legislature, who could not be said to be actual residents in their States whilst at the Seat of the Gen[l] Government.
>
> Mr. MERCER. It would certainly exclude men, who had once been inhabitants, and returning from residence elsewhere to resettle in their original State; Although a want of the necessary knowledge could not be in such case be presumed.
> Mr. Mason thought 7 years too long, but would never agree to part with the principle. It is a valuable principle. He thought it a defect in the plan that the Representatives would be too few to bring with them all the local knowledge necessary. If residence be not required, Rich men ("may" stricken out) of neighboring States, may employ with success the means of corruption in some particular district and thereby get into the public Councils after having failed in their own State. This is the practice in the boroughs of England.

> On / question for inserting "inhabitant" in place of "resident"—Ag[d] to mem. com.

From the foregoing it would clearly appear that the founders of the Constitution had definitely in mind a case exactly similar to the present one. If there was one thing that the founding Fathers desired to prevent in their new experiment upon this hemisphere it surely was the rotton borough system of Great Britain. The entire tenor of the debate just above cited demanded that a Representative should come to the seat of government from the State in which he was a bona fide inhabitant, not a resident only and mere voting citizen, nor one having temporary or actual or permanent domicile for purposes of taxation and other purposes for the exercise of the right of citizenship. But it was desired that he should be an actual inhabitant completely identified with the State which he chose to represent. He was not to be a person, rich, or poor, coming into one State from another in which he was an inhabitant and then attempting to seek a place in the public councils of one State after having failed in his political ambitions elsewhere.

This view was debated in the most famous and best considered case upon the subject in the history of our legislative procedure, namely, the case of Mr. John Bailey, claiming to be entitled to a seat in the Eighteenth Congress from the State of Massachusetts. Before the House passes definitely upon this question it would be well for every Member to read the Annals of Congress, volume 42, in subvolume 18, part 2, 1824, Eighteenth Congress, first session, beginning at page 1794. This case has been very thoroughly considered in Hinds' Precedents, volume 1, published in 1907, beginning at page 419. I deem this case to be of sufficient importance that I quote copiously from it. That case in the Eighteenth Congress was decided without party lines being taken into consideration. We are fortunate in this regard because the House of Representatives of the Seventieth Congress has an unusual opportunity of laying down and fixing a precedent. Mr. Bailey opened the debate (see p. 1794, above quoted) and admitted practically all of the facts showing conclusively that on October 1, 1817, while a resident of Massachusetts, he was appointed as a clerk in the Department of State. He immediately repaired to Washington and entered upon the duties of his position and continued to hold the position and reside in Washington until October 3, 1823, when he resigned the appointment.

It did not appear that he exercised any of the rights of citizenship in his district and there was evidence to show that he considered Massachusetts as his home and his residence in Washington only temporary. It was shown that Mr. Bailey resided in Washington only temporarily. It was shown that Mr. Bailey resided in Washington at a public hotel with occasional absences on business to Massachusetts until his marriage in Washington, at which time he took up his residence with his wife's mother. The election at which Mr. Bailey was chosen a Representative was held September 8, 1823, at which time he was actually residing in Washington in his capacity as a clerk in the State Department. He actually had, however, a large law library in the State of Massachusetts. He never claimed any other State as a place of inhabitancy, residence, domicile, or citizenship. The House had only to deal with the question of his status in the State of Massachusetts and District of Columbia (see p. 1799):

The report proceeds to state "that the true theory of representative government" requires that the representative be "selected from the bosom of that society which is composed of his constituents"; and that he should possess a knowledge of their character and political views, and for that purpose should "mingle in their company and join in their conversations"; and "that he should especially have that reciprocity of feeling and identity of interest which exist only among members of the same community." This is a beautiful theory, but happens to make no part of our Constitution, and therefore has no application to the case in question. We are all prone to fancy to ourselves what ought to be a rule of action, and thence to infer that such is in fact the established rule. This is an error. Our inquiry now is, What is the Constitution? Not, what ought it to be? That the above picture is ideal, and unsupported by the Constitution, is easily shown.

If the people of a country, by common consent, consider a person as an inhabitant of a State, though he is temporarily absent in public employment, this must be received as the true meaning of the word, even if there were not a single formal decision on the point. Such general practice shows what is the common-sense interpretation of the word, and is conclusive of the question.

It was further argued:

What are the facts in the case before us? The Member is a native of Massachusetts; he is intimately acquainted with the policy and interest of that State; he is presumed to participate in the feelings of his immediate constituents; he has been reared up in the bosom of that society, where his father still resides, and is bound to them by the strongest ties; he has been honored, on several occasions, with a seat in their State legislatures. A few years past, he was appointed to discharge the duties of a clerk in the State Department, within this District; that truce was accepted, with the positive declaration that he did not intend to renounce his native State; and that Massachusetts was his home. During his residence here, he boarded at a tavern, until within some few months previous to his selection, and occasionally returned to Massachusetts. He purchased no property here; and that which he possessed consisting of near 800 volumes was left in that State. He has declined all participation in the concerns of this District. His constituents and himself had intercourse with each other, and understood, much better than we can know, the relations which existed between them. Considering him a citizen and inhabitant of their State, they called upon him to know whether he was willing to serve them in Congress. He yielded to their solicitation, and was elected by a majority of all the votes in the district. No person has claimed his place. But his eligibility has been contested, in a remonstrance signed by 26 persons only, and inclosed under a blank cover, to a Member of Congress, and we are called upon to vacate his seat.

Against the seating of Mr. Bailey it was argued as follows:

Let us discard, sir, these subtle refinements, which only lead us from perplexity to absurdity, and construe this Constitution as we should, according to the plain common acceptation of words. It is a question of common sense merely. The gentleman has resided in this city more than seven years; his family is here; his dwelling place is here; it is his home. He is eligible to any office under the corporation of the place—a subject in the District—liable to jury duties. I repeat the question which I put to the committee before. It has not yet been answered. If this District was entitled to a Delegate in this House, whose qualification should be that he was an inhabitant of the District of Columbia, would he not be eligible to the place? Is he not now entitled to every privilege or right of an inhabitant of this District, be those rights what they may, civil or political? These questions must be answered in the affirmative; and unless it can be shown that he has a sort of double capacity, which may constitute him an inhabitant of two distinct places at one time, and furnish him with two different domiciles, he must be considered as an inhabitant of this District. When the nature of his rights may be here, or their extent, is a question of no importance. Be they greater or less, he is entitled to them, whatever they may be. It is enough for us that he has become an inhabitant of the District, and has lost his inhabitancy in Massachusetts, and is thereby rendered obnoxious to that clause of the Constitution which forbids his eligibility in that State.

A powerful argument was used on page 1838 relative to those who are inhabitants of the District of Columbia:

An inhabitant of one State is deprived of the right of being elected in all the other States. Is there any reason in the imagination of any part of the House why this District, or those who are inhabitants here, should be more highly favored and gifted with more unlimited privileges than the inhabitants of the States? Where, then, is the disfranchisement which has been so often complained of and resounded in this debate, and in what does it consist? The inhabitants of this District are, in this respect, on a perfect equality with all others. If they have not the right of sitting in this House as Members, the fault, if anywhere, is in the Constitution which has denied the District a representation because it is a union of the State and not of Territories.

See also the following, on page 1838:

If, by removing to this District, he loses his inhabitancy in his original State, it is his free act, and he must submit to the disability in return for the advantages, if any, which he may have supposed himself to acquire by changing his previous residence. The whole question, therefore, results in the inquiry whether the facts in the case do not show a change of domicile—whether, under all the circumstances existing in relation to the residence of the gentleman in this city, he must not be deemed to have been so established here as to create an inhabitancy in this District? Had his residence here been transient and not uniform; had he left a dwelling house in Massachusetts, in which his family resided for any part of the year; had he left there any insignia of a home—furniture or any property which usually accompanies a household establishment—all or any of these would be deemed indications that his domicile in Massachusetts was not abandoned. Instead of any indications of this nature we find him here for years, discharging the duties of an office permanent in their nature—establishing domestic connections in this city, and residing here with all the characteristics of a permanent inhabitant. Common sense seems to teach us that he is so; that he has emigrated from Massachusetts in search of better fortunes which perhaps he has acquired. In forming my opinion, sir, I disregard the declarations which have been occasionally expressed by him, that he considered Massachusetts as his home; that this city was a temporary residence. Every man doubtless intends to change his domicile when better prospects elsewhere are presented. It is probable he came here for the enjoyment of the public office which he has held, and that whenever it became convenient or necessary to leave it he intended to return to Massachusetts, unless he could more beneficially establish himself elsewhere. All these vague and contingent intentions are entertained by every man.

In a powerful argument, beginning on page 1838, Mr. Storrs uses the following language:

The circumstances of the case now before us call upon us to maintain with vigilance some of the most important principles of the Constitution—principles which were established for the preservation of the purity and independence of the House of Representatives. We are not only asked to allow a seat here to one whose inhabitancy is not bona fide among his constituents, but one who comes from the executive departments. If this District is to furnish Members for this House, it is the more dangerous if they are to be educated under the immediate eye of their political patrons. The framers of the Constitution intended that a Representative here should come from the bosom of his constituents; that he should live among them; be conversant with their feelings; their wishes, and their wants; that he should know their political principles, and be identified with the people whom he represents. They entertained no notions of that technical inhabitancy which has been set up here to fritter away the most salutary purposes of the Constitution. The example of England was before them where, under the form, though in mockery, of representative government, the Parliament was filled with placemen and pensioners. They never intended to turn the States of this Union into rotten boroughs or to make this District the great and common borough of all the States. There is something so pregnant with mischief to the character of this House in the doctrines which have been advanced, and so threatening in its purity, that I feel as if, in giving up or relaxing the construction of this part of the Constitution, we give up the Constitution itself, or render it an idle mockery. If there is anything to be feared in this Government, it is the corrupting influence of patronage. The Constitution considers all placement of the Government as unfit to represent the people in the legislative department. I speak, sir, with no allusion to the gentleman whose seat is now questioned; but all history and experience, our observation of human nature, and our knowledge of the motives and springs of human action, warn us to look with jealousy to any interpretation of this part of the Constitution which shall approximate to a relaxation of its spirit and intention. If we sanction the principle that the incumbents of office here are to be universally eligible in the States, I beg, gentlemen, to reflect what an enormous and irresistible weight of influence may be brought to bear upon the State elections, to promote the views of government and fill this House with the creatures of executive power. The patronage of government in the States will be devoted to this end. The connections of men in office here are powerful and numerous elsewhere. The officers of your Government scattered throughout the Union are multiplying every day. Dependent on governmental favor, they naturally rally round the power which feeds them, and will be found subservient to its will. This vast machinery, when once organized and put in motion, will exercise a powerful control in the States, and the election will feel the worst of all influence in a free government. Candidates for this House, furnished from the departments here, will be supported by your marshals, judges, and hosts of customhouse and other executive officers of the States.

The Treasury of the Nation will sustain, through the dispensations of Executive bounty, this pernicious system. We have no reason to believe that, in all our future history, administrations may not be found which might avail themselves of such means to sustain their influence in this House. The only barrier to Executive power is here—its only effectual restraint is in preserving the identification of this House with the people and closing every avenue to the approach of Executive influence in our deliberations. Sanction the doctrine that the officers of the departments are eligible and we may find here, at some future day, a semiofficial cabinet, a bench of ministers—men who have merely laid aside the forms of office, but whose political feelings and partiality and obligations center in the Executive will; a packed Parliament—men who are taught to look anywhere but where they should look for support, to the approbation of their constituents. Why has the Constitution prohibited any officer of the Government from holding a seat in Congress? It is, sir, because they are presumed to be politically unfit for legislation—because the influence of patronage is often too strong to be resisted—because their interests and partialities are not in unison with the mass of the Nation; and because all experience has proved that they are the most pliant instruments of the power which supports them in office and dispenses the public emoluments.

Mr. Hall, of North Carolina, beginning on page 1854, argued as follows:

Gentlemen seem to have fallen into some strange hallucination on this subject. In maintaining their doctrine they undertake to subvert a plain and imperative requisition of the fundamental statute of this land, by applying to it, constructively, the principles of the common law of nations. Suppose that in some of the State courts any lawyer in a plain case of law and fact, a case where a statute applied explicitly to some crime, a case in which the evidence was completely made out and the law and the fact in entire unison—what would be thought, in such a case, of any lawyer who should attempt to overthrow, by applying to it the principles of the British common law from Blackstone, or by preaching a politico-moral homily from Paley and Beccaria? And, yet, it would be of a piece with what is now attempted.

Mr. Speaker, I have prescribed to myself a very plain and simple method of construing this instrument which I hold in my hand, the Constitution of the United States—a method which, if pursued with a view solely to the truth, will generally be right. It is, to take the plain vernacular meaning of the words in which any subject is couched, and endeavor, in their plain sense, to find what was the intention of its framers. Having to the best of my judgment done this, I adhere to that interpretation without attempting to bend or twist it to answer, by a strained construction, any other purposes which, were I to do, I should be guilty of treason against my understanding and my moral sense.

I have applied this rule to that part of the Constitution which says "that no person shall be a Representative who shall not have attained to the age of 25 years and been seven years a citizen of the United States, and who shall not, when elected, be an inhabitant of that State in which he shall be chosen." From which, it appears to me, that the framers of the Constitution meant to exclude two orders of persons from the House of Representatives as Members—persons who are not citizens of the United States, and citizens who are habitual nonresidents of the States in which they are elected. So that the Constitution demands, in so many words, that to be a Representative it is not only necessary to be a citizen of the United States, but, in addition to this, a person to become so must live among those who are to become his constituents, evidently drawing a plain and marked line of distinction between citizenship and inhabitance.

Gentlemen fall into this error by confounding the abstract political right of citizenship with the act of inhabitance which the Constitution requires; but, sir, I consider them doubly disqualified from becoming Members of this House by habitual residence out of the State for which they were or might be elected (I know of no better definition of inhabitance than habitual residence; I would thank any gentleman for a better), and officeholding under the United States, which, so long as they continue to do, is a disqualification in the face of that part of the Constitution which requires that "no person holding any office under the United States shall be a Member of either House during his continuance in office"—showing clearly an intention to keep distinct and immiscible the executive and legislative functions of the Government; and, sir, to return to the gentleman from Massachusetts, I feel no hesitation in saying that his seat ought to be vacated upon this ground, if he labored under no other disability.

Hinds' Precedents, volume 1, beginning at page 420, digests the famous Bailey case in part as follows:

The committee comment upon the fact that the word "resident" had first been proposed but had been put aside for "inhabitant" as being a "stronger" term, intended to express more clearly their intention that the persons to be elected should be completely identified with the State in which they were to be chosen.

The word "inhabitant" comprehended a simple fact—locality of existence; that of "citizen" a combination of civil privileges, some of which may be enjoyed in any of the States of the Union. The word "citizen" might properly be construed to mean a member of a political society, and, although he might be absent for years and cease to be an inhabitant of its territory, his rights of citizenship might not be thereby forfeited. The committee quote Vattel and Jacob's Law Dictionary to show that the character of inhabitant is derived from habitation and abode and not from political privileges.

See also page 421:

The construction put on the word "inhabitant" by the various States was not particularly pertinent, as it might import a different sense in different States. The construction merely. Mr. Bailey's residence was in the District. He was eligible for office there. If the District were entitled to a Delegate in the House whose qualifications should be that he should be an inhabitant of the District, he would certainly be eligible for that place. Therefore he must have lost his inhabitancy in Massachusetts. So far as inhabitancy was concerned, the District stood on the same basis as the other Territories of the United States.

Also see the following:

An inhabitant of one State was deprived of the right of being elected in all the other States. Was there any reason why the inhabitants of the District should be more highly favored than the inhabitants of the States? It was inevitable that in moving from State to State political and even personal rights must suffer modification or extinction with the changed condition of law. So in moving to the District certain rights enjoyed in the States were lost. If the residence of Mr. Bailey here had been transient and not uniform, had he left a dwelling house in Massachusetts in which his family resided a part of the year, had he left there any of the insignia of a household establishment, there would be indication that his domicile in Massachusetts had not been abandoned. It had been argued that the expressed intention to return to Massachusetts should govern. But the law ascertained intention in such a case by deducting from facts. The danger of allowing the Executive to furnish Members of Congress from the public service was discussed at length. The committee did not contend that a Member must be actually residing in a State at the time of his election. Foreign ministers going abroad, but from the nature of the case precluded from becoming citizens of a foreign power or obtaining the rights of inhabitancy, did not lose their inhabitancy at home by absence.

It will be argued in behalf of the sitting Member that the case of Phillip B. Key is of importance (see Hinds' Precedents, vol. 1, p. 417):

As to his inhabitancy in the State, the committee report facts showing that Mr. Key was a native of Maryland and a citizen and resident of the State at the time of the adoption of the Constitution of 1787; that he was never a citizen or resident of any other of the United States; that in 1801 he removed from Maryland to his house in Georgetown, about 2 miles without the boundaries of Maryland, where he continued to reside until 1806, when, on September 18, he removed with his family and household to a partially completed summer home (intended for himself and not for an overseer), which he was building on an estate in Maryland bought by him in 1805, and which was part of an estate owned many years by Mrs. Key's family. Here he was residing October 6, 1806, the date of his election. On October 20, 1806, he removed with his family and household to his house near Georgetown which he lived in until July, 1807, when they returned to the Maryland house and lived in and inhabited it until October 23, 1807. On that date they returned to the house near Georgetown, that he might attend to his duties in Congress. It further appeared that he had continud the practice of law in Maryland and had declined practice in the District of Columbia; and that in January, February, and March, 1806, he had declared that he intended to reside in Maryland, and that he bought the land with that intention. It was urged and admitted that the Maryland house was fitted only for a summer residence, and was much inferior to the house near Georgetown; and that the latter was left practically with its furnishings complete whenever the family went to Maryland.

But that case is so readily distinguished from the present one that it is amazing that the Key case should have been even referred to. First he was a native of Maryland. He was never a resident or citizen of any other of the United States. He moved into the District of Columbia. But at the same time he was constructing a summer home in the State of Maryland on his own property or at least the property of his wife. He was residing on that property on the date of his election. He continued the practice of law in Maryland and declined to practice in the District of Columbia. He bought 1,000 acres of land about a year before his election in the State of Maryland, declaring it as his intention to use it as his permanent residence. In the present case Mr. BECK left Pennsylvania in 1903 with the intention of securing a competence. He bought property in New York and voted there. He bought property in New Jersey and voted there. He established a law office in the District of Columbia and resides in that District, practicing law actively here and no other place, in law offices with a firm of lawyers which practices before the governmental departments in matters which have a direct and positive bearing upon the Treasury and governmental policies of the United States. His one act in Pennsylvania had to do with an attempt to establish a voting residence there, whereas the Constitution requires that he must be an inhabitant.

Another case that will be cited is the case of Charles H. Upton (Hinds' Precedents, vol. 1, p. 297). No case could possibly be a stronger one than the Upton case against the right of Mr. BECK to a seat in this body. Mr. Upton for 25 years prior to consideration of his case had been a freeholder in the State of Virginia. For most of the time he had been a resident and inhabitant of the county of Fairfax, where he and his family were domiciled. For some time prior to the month of November, 1860, the sitting Member had lived in Zanesville, Ohio, where he owned an interest in a newspaper and helped to conduct it. The committee was satisfied that shortly after the Ohio elections Mr. Upton had returned to the county of Fairfax, Va., where his family had remained and there was. From that time forward he continued to be a resident and inhabitant of the State of Virginia. In the present case Mr. BECK at no time disassociated himself or his family from the State of New Jersey or from the District of Columbia. He went to the State of Pennsylvania apparently, and his first entry into the civic life of that State appears to have been through a fraudulent registration on May 3, 1926. In no way has there been complete identification of Mr. BECK with the State of Pennsylvania. As we shall presently argue, he did not become a qualified voter of the State nor did he establish a bona fide residence there.

It is interesting to note that the case of Bayley against Barbour has been cited. It begins with section 435, on page 432, of volume 1 of Hinds' Precedents. At the time of Mr. Barbour's election from Virginia his wife owned real estate in the city of Alexandria. Barbour was a native of Virginia, had always been a citizen of that State, never claimed to have lived elsewhere in a permanent sense, and never exercised the rights of citizenship in any other State or Territory. In the present case Mr. BECK voted in New York and New Jersey for over 21 years, then established a law office in Washington, D. C., and continued at the time of his election and still continues to hold permanent residence here as well as permanent occupation as a legal practitioner. Barbour had his post office, business headquarters, and residence required by statute for service of legal process in Alexandria. He had a temporary winter residence in Washington, but also had a house in Alexandria, where with his family he was residing on the date of the congressional election at which he was elected. Service of process was also made upon him at Alexandria as president of a railroad company. When traveling away from Virginia he invariably registered himself as from Virginia. The House in that case took the same position as did the House in the Bailey case, when they said that Mr. Barbour was in point of fact before and at the time of his election an actual inhabitant of Virginia enjoying all the rights and subject to all the burdens as such.

It is also further remarkable that the case of Eldridge v. Underwood (vol. 2, Hinds' Precedents, p. 631) has been cited. An examination of the hearings as well as the debates show conclusively that at the time of the election the contestant was actually an inhabitant of Alabama and that his wife resided in Ohio temporarily only because of inability at that time to reside in Alabama.

Applying the foregoing precedents in the House of Representatives to the particular facts of this case, it is quite clear that Mr. BECK when elected was not an inhabitant of Pennsylvania, either actually or in the constitutional sense. The framers of the Constitution had clearly in mind a case exactly like the present, and therefore they had before them in the original draft the words "resident," "inhabitant," "voter," "occupant," and words having similar and cognate meanings. The original draft, without debate, had carried the word "resident," whereupon, after mature deliberation and without a dissenting voice, the word "inhabitant" was used in this particular clause. The word "inhabitant" then meant exactly what "inhabitant" means now. The States which had been raised up then still exist as States of the same, though enlarged, Federal Union. It was contemplated then, as now, that there were people residing in cities, towns, villages, and upon farms and plantations. A large number of the people in the Nation had been born in Europe and had cast their lots with the Colonists in the Revolution. The English common law had been transferred to America. The old English idea was, according to one text writer, that one of the best tests of inhabitancy in England in determining classifications under acts of Parliament was whether or not an owner, tenant, or occupant manured the land which he occupied and tilled. The theory was that permanency was evidenced by such action, that he who tilled and enriched the soil was an inhabitant, as against one who made barren the soil by temporary use and occupation, and so after many centuries the idea of permanency of occupation and habitual occupation came into use when the word "inhabitancy" was considered. It was conceded then that a man might reside temporarily in several places, but the place which he occupied with the greatest degree of permanency was the place in which he was an inhabitant. And so this theory concerning inhabitancy has become so fixed and determinate in all the law of every State that it is hard to believe that anyone could get another meaning out of it than actual, permanent, and habitual residence, and in addition thereto actual, permanent, habitual residence in a domicile in the place in which he claims to be an inhabitant. Black's Law Dictionary (2d ed., p. 625) defines the word as follows:

> Inhabitant: One who resides actually and permanently in a given place, and has his domicile there. (Ex parte Shaw, 145 U. S. 444, 12 Sup. Ct. 935, 36 L. Ed. 768; The Pizarro, 2 Wheat. 245, 4 L. Ed. 226.)
> The words "inhabitant," "citizen," and "resident," as employed in different constitutions to define the qualifications of electors, mean substantially the same thing; and one is an inhabitant, resident, or citizen at the place where he has his domicile or home. (Cooley, Const. Lim. *600.) But the terms "resident" and "inhabitant" have also been held not synonymous, the latter implying a more fixed and permanent abode than the former, and importing privileges and duties to which a mere resident would not be subject. (Tazewell County v. Davenport, 40 Ill. 197.)

The latest authentic definition upon the subject is contained in Corpus Juris, volume 31, page 1194. The term "inhabitant" has been conceived to be entirely free from technicality and declared to have a known and universally accepted meaning, all agreeing in considering "inhabitant" as directly connected with habitation and abode. (Spraggins v. Houghton, 3 Ill. 377–397.)

On page 1195 of the same work we find the statement of the general law, both Federal, State, and municipal; "in law the term 'inhabitant' is used technically with varying meaning in respect to permanency of abode." It embraces locality of existence or fixed permanent home and excludes the idea of a temporary residence. All lexicographers distinguish an inhabitant as one who dwells in a place with the intention of making it his home and not a mere transient or temporary sojourner therein. The term embraces the fact of residence at a place with intent to respect and make it his home. The act and intent must concur and the intent may be inferred from declaration and conduct.

See note 86 at bottom of page 1195 of the same volume of Corpus Juris:

> The Latin habitara, the root of this word, imparts by its very construction frequency, constancy, permanency, closeness of connection, attachment, both physical and moral, and the word "in" serves to give additional force to these senses.

Cases in practically all of the States of the Union are quoted to substantiate this doctrine and particularly do cases in Illinois, Indiana, Alabama, Nebraska, Minnesota, Mississippi, New Jersey, New York, Pennsylvania, Texas, Michigan, Kansas, West Virginia, California, Missouri, and Tennessee stand out.

A very leading case is that of Sharp v. Casper (36 N. J. L. 387), in which the following language is used:

> One who has an actual, but merely temporary, residence in a place is not in any proper sense an inhabitant of that place. An inhabitant of a town or ward is one who has his domicile there, his fixed habitation and home from which he has no present intention of removing.

See also the following:

> Absence as affecting: Actual residence—that is, personal presence in a place—is one circumstance to determine the domicile or the fact of being an inhabitant, but it is far from being conclusive. A seaman on a long voyage and a soldier in actual service may be, respectively, inhabitants of a place, though not personally present there for years. It depends, therefore, upon many other considerations besides actual presence. Where an old resident and inhabitant, having a domicile from his birth in a particular place or country, the great question whether he has changed his domicile or whether he has ceased to be an inhabitant of one place and become an inhabitant of another will depend mainly upon the question, to be determined from all the circumstances, whether the new residence is temporary or permanent; whether it is occasional, for the purpose of a visit or of accomplishing a temporary object; or whether it is for the purpose of continued residence and abode, until some new resolution be taken to remove. If the departure from one's fixed and settled abode is for a purpose in its nature temporary, whether it be business or pleasure, accompanied with an intent of returning and resuming the former place of abode as soon as such purpose is accomplished; in general, such a person continues to be an inhabitant at such place of abode for all purposes of enjoying civil and political privileges and of being subject to civil duties. (Sears v. Boston, 1 Metc. (Mass.) 250, 251.)

And so all the States, as well as the higher courts of the United States, establish that an "inhabitant" is an habitual resident, and that he must have about him a degree of constancy, permanency, and steadiness in an actual domicile in the place of abode.

Therefore the framers of the Constitution recognize clearly the distinction between the words "inhabitant," "resident," "citizen," and "voter," because in the particular clause in question they use the words "citizen of the United States" in fixing the length of time of residence and the word "inhabitant" prescribing qualifications with regard to actual, habitual residence. This is further signified, since in section 2 of Article I the word "inhabitant" was used fixing the qualifications of a Representative, and in section 3 of Article I they also used the word "inhabitant" when fixing the qualifications of Senators, and in section 1 of Article II, clause 4, the framers establish that the President must merely have been a resident for 14 years within the United States, but, of course, it was found nenecessary that he be a natural-born citizen. In the twelfth amendment to the Constitution it is specifically provided that the presidential electors shall vote by ballot for President and Vice President, but one of them, at least, could not be an inhabitant of the same State with such electors. The fourteenth amendment specifically defines "citizenship" as follows:

> All persons born or naturalized in the United States and subject to jurisdiction thereof are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside.

Therefore the framers of the Constitution clearly and concisely gave to the word "inhabitant" a meaning which they expected would run without interruption through the course of existence of the Republic which they were constituting. A Representative and a Senator had to be an inhabitant of his State, but the President needed only to have been a natural-born citizen or a citizen at the time of the adoption of the Constitution and a resident for at least 14 years.

JAMES M. BECK was not an habitual resident nor an inhabitant of Pennsylvania in November, 1927, nor was he a bona fide resident of that State. Furthermore, he was not even a qualified voter.

Under the fourteenth amendment, of course, Mr. BECK was then and is now a citizen of the United States, but he could not possibly be a citizen of the State of Pennsylvania, not being a resident there, but he is a citizen of the United States residing in the District of Columbia, and is therefore a citizen of that District. If the right to vote were given to the citizens of that District, and if it were given by constitutional amendment a Representative or Senator in Congress, or both, would anyone say sincerely that Mr. BECK would not be qualified to represent the District in Congress? There could be no possible question about that, because he is an inhabitant of the District of Columbia, filing his income-tax returns from this District, registering his automobile as a resident of the District of Columbia, residing here with his home, books, paintings, furniture, and his family permanently, and returning his intangible taxes to the taxing authorities within the District.

At the outset of the hearings it was suggested that a man could be an inhabitant of several States. That is clearly an erroneous doctrine, especially in the constitutional sense; because if that were possible under the Constitution, he could qualify for Representative and Senator from several States at one and the same time. This idea, upon mature reflection, runs violently against every constitutional interpretation. But a man can be a resident of several States. He can reside in each of them temporarily, but in order to be an inhabitant under the Constitution it is necessary that he have his domicile in the State in which he claims inhabitancy. On page 10 of the hearings, Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona, from the committee, suggested by his questions that a bad precedent would be established if we went outside of the Constitution and allowed outsiders to come into the State in order to be elected to Congress. Further answer is made to the inquiry of Mr. BACHMANN, on the committee, who inquired as to whether it would not be a controlling factor to determine the State in which the Representative voted.

This, of course, is not controlling, because the word "citizen," as pointed out in the Bailey case, means nothing more than a member of a political society and is wrapped up about a combination of civil privileges, some of which may be enjoyed in any State or in several States at the same time. Further, the word "citizen" of the United States and of any State is clearly defined by the fourteenth amendment, but no one will dispute that the construction of the word "inhabitant" in this case is purely within the jurisdiction of Congress. The construction put upon the word in any State or all the States is important merely as throwing light upon the general subject. The House of Representatives, always jealous of its own dignity, integrity, as well as its perpetuity, stands out under the Constitution as being the exclusive judge of the qualifications of its Members, and so the House in this case must determine from all the precedents whether the person elected was an inhabitant at the time of his election of the State from which elected, irrespective of his privilege of franchise.

I can conceive of a situation where one State might relax in the stringency of its election laws and permit a man to vote on a property qualification merely, without requiring residence or inhabitancy. Therefore that same person could be an actual inhabitant of another State and be eligible to come to Congress from a State in which he was not a qualified voter, because if he voted in one State he certainly could not be a voter in another. But in this case, it is argued, because of an argument made by one of the members of the Constitutional Convention, the word "inhabitant" would not exclude persons who had been absent for a time upon public or private business; that is true, but Mr. BECK does not come within that classification. His statement and testimony seem to indicate that he believes that having been born in Pennsylvania and having resided there until 1903, he went away, emulating Benjamin Franklin, to secure a competence, and was away from Pennsylvania on public and private business until 1926, but within the terms of the Constitution he was an inhabitant of Pennsylvania until 1903, or at least until he became Assistant Attorney General, and, by his own testimony, he was an inhabitant of New York until 1920. Then he sold his property and became a bona fide inhabitant of the District of Columbia, moving to that District all that he held dear and of which he was most fond. Of course, in 1922 and 1924, under the laws of New Jersey, he may have been qualified to vote, so, therefore, we go back to the old doctrine which the House laid down after seven days of debate over a hundred years ago, when it said that a person in Mr. BECK's position could be a citizen of the United States with his residence in the District of Columbia.

By choosing citizenship in New Jersey, because he there had real estate, personal property, and a voting residence, and a certain status in New Jersey wrapped up in a combination of civil privileges, Mr. BECK was authorized to vote, but what has he done to change the condition which existed from 1920 until 1926? He did not move his residence; he did not create a domicile; he attempted merely to add to an already existing status, to wit, while he owned property in New Jersey and had his home in Washington and was a mere private citizen engaged in the practice of the law at his permanent home in Washington, D. C., he attempted by artificial means to add to an already existing status by creating the combination civil privileges in Philadelphia which would do nothing more than transfer his voting status from New Jersey to Pennsylvania. But he has performed no act of a permanent nature, nor has engaged in a continuous, habitual, and permanent source of conduct which would justify him in saying that he is an inhabitant of Pennsylvania or that he has been such an inhabitant since 1903.

At no point in Mr. BECK'S testimony does he do any more than claim that he had resumed his citizenship in Pennsylvania. Nowhere does he make the claim that he became again an inhabitant. (See p. 21 of the hearings.)

On page 40, he admits that in 1924, having no vote in Washington, and having lost his vote in New York, he voted from his summer home in New Jersey, but that he took no steps whatever after 1924, until the present time, in New Jersey, to show that he had abandoned his civil privileges there.

Therefore if he had done nothing in Philadelphia, attempting to add to an already existing status, he would still have been a qualified voter in New Jersey, with his habitation in Washington, D. C.

Can it be supposed that the claimant is an inhabitant of Pennsylvania when he does not eat or sleep in what he claims to be his residence there? On page 59 it is shown that he has no wearing apparel in this so-called habitation. He has less than six books and perhaps none in this apartment, his sister resides continuously at the apartment and has done so for the past year. In the summer of 1927 Mr. BECK was at his Sea Bright, N. J., home and for another month of that year he was in Europe. His children both live in Europe. His wife has scarcely ever occupied this apartment—there is only one bedroom in it; therefore, when his sister is there, he testified he slept at the Art Club, Philadelphia, of which he was, knowingly, a nonresident member. If his sister occupied the apartment continuously, Mr. BECK, therefore, never slept in it, having never eaten in it, having no clothes and no books in it, and since his wife rarely, if ever, occupied it, it is difficult to understand just what Mr. BECK'S argument is, and how he, as a man of high intellect and legal attainments, can indulge himself with the belief that he is an inhabitant of Pennsylvania. The strongest thing that can be said for him is, taking his statement at its face value, he intended to resume his citizenship in Pennsylvania.

Residence is, in some degree, a matter of intention, inhabitancy is in every degree a question of fact, shown by the acts of him who claims to be an inhabitant. There may be some element of intention about it, but the intent must be shown by unqualified acts, showing a consummated desire to become an habitual resident, with continuous acts showing conclusive degree of permanency.

On page 58 it is shown in his testimony that Mr. BECK established this apartment that he might have the status of a citizen:

Mr. BECK. I do not know as to that. But what I do want to impress upon the committee is this: That in taking that apartment when I rented it, what was the dominant purpose with me was to again establish a status in Philadelphia as one of its people. The seat in Congress was then a possibility undoubtedly, and I would not want to say, and could not say truthfully, that it had nothing to do with the renting of the apartment.

But I was by no means clear in my mind that I wanted to go to Congress. It involved a very substantial sacrifice to me. But, at least, I did not want to be the kind of Washingtonian who was content to escape all civic responsibilities and duties, and I felt I had all my life preached the duty of every citizen taking a part in politics, and I ought to have a status as a citizen and that I could not have it in Washington, and I established it in Philadelphia to do my civic duty.

On pages 53 and 54, may we call attention to the fact that Mr. BECK practically admits, although in a very hesitating way, that his sister occupied the apartment continuously and, therefore, he could not have done so.

Mr. KENT. Now, when did you go back to Philadelphia after that? What was your first trip back?

Mr. BECK. I could not tell you about my first trip after that.

Mr. KENT. How long had you been there before you made the three speeches?

Mr. BECK. I doubt very much whether I was in Philadelphia except those three nights before the election—I mean in the immediately antecedent days. I could not tell you exactly. The situation is this, Mr. KENT: I have been in Philadelphia, as my statement shows, if you exclude the summer months, almost every week. I have business in New York. I will break my journey in Philadelphia, then go to New York and transact my business there; then spend another night in Philadelphia, and then come here. Sometimes I have public addresses to make in Philadelphia, and then I will stay there longer. But if you want to prove that—I am going to admit it—and I want to admit anything that is true, whether it helps or hurts my case—if you want to prove that I spend more time in my Washington home than in my Philadelphia home, I admit it. And if that is fatal to my case that is the end of the case.

See pages 53 and 54. This apartment, the testimony shows conclusively, was rented solely for the purpose of establishing a voting residence in the erroneous belief that such procedure would satisfy the Constitution of the United States fixing qualifications for Representatives. We quote from pages 51 and 52 of the hearings:

Mr. KENT. Now, may we have the name of the sister, please?

Mr. BECK. Miss Helen Beck.

Mr. KENT. Now, you have stated that when she occupied the apartment at night, you did not. You have also stated in your statement before the committee that she resides there almost continuously?

Mr. BECK. I say, since she has returned from Europe. I mean in the last year, I think it was, she has been there right along.

Mr. KENT. In Europe?

Mr. BECK. No; I mean to say that she has been at that apartment.

Mr. KENT. I see—and she has occupied it at night?

Mr. BECK. Yes. But whenever I wanted it, I would take it.

Mr. KENT. She goes down, now, does she not, a couple of times to get the mail?

Mr. BECK. She does not go down. She is there.

Mr. KENT. All the time?

Mr. BECK. Well, you do not mean 24 hours a day. She goes out like anybody else.

Mr. KENT. But she inhabits this apartment continuously?

Mr. BECK. Mr. Kent, outside of a visit she has made down to Washington, I suppose my sister has been there continuously.

Mr. KENT. Then it was suggested to you that you could take this seat?

Mr. BECK. Oh, yes.

Mr. KENT. By whom?

Mr. BECK. Well, it is fair to say that I sought the place.

Mr. KENT. Yes; I see.

Mr. BECK. When I say I sought it, I mean I sought it not six months ago; but I expressed a desire when I reidentified myself with Philadelphia to represent, if possible, the city in Congress. I had no desire for any local office, or rather, that did not appeal to me. But I did think I could do something for my native city in Congress, and therefore I am not posing as having had this thing thrust upon me. I expressed a desire to go to Congress, and that desire was acceded to.

Mr. KENT. And promptly, therefore, you suggested to friends that you had the desire to go to Congress from Philadelphia?

Mr. BECK. Yes.

Mr. KENT. And represent your native city?

Mr. BECK. Yes.

See also page 61 of the hearings, in which it is definitely and conclusively shown that Mr. BECK, in his search for apartments in Philadelphia, with Albert Greenfield, Mr. VARE'S lieutenant and principal financial supporter, was confined to the first congressional district, that the apartment was selected in full anticipation of the fact that he might run for Congress and that the selection of the locality had in mind a possibility of his going to Congress.

Mr. KENT. The location of the apartments then, that you and Mr. Greenfield visited was fixed, not because of the fact that they were in the first congressional district and that Mr. VARE is likely to be nominated for the United States Senate, thus causing a vacancy in the congressional seat, but because of your love for that particular section of the city?

Mr. BECK. No; I do not pretend that. The apartment was selected in full anticipation of the fact that I might run for Congress. My point is that my taking any habitation in Philadelphia had as its dominant purpose the desire to be reidentified with the political life of Philadelphia, quite irrespective of whether I ran for Congress or not. But the selection of that locality had in mind the possibility of my going to Congress; and it also had in mind that it was very accessible to the main thoroughfare of Philadelphia, and right around the corner from my club.

Mr. KENT. This was, then, in anticipation of becoming the successor to Mr. VARE?

Mr. BECK. In anticipation of the possibility.

Mr. KENT. And therefore Mr. Hazlett became a candidate for Congress in order to hold the seat until you should become a qualified voter?

Mr. BECK. No; on the contrary. I can not interpret Mr. Hazlett's views. But I think Mr. Hazlett was unwilling to give up his seat unless he could be elected recorder of deeds. He preferred the local office. If he had been defeated for recorder of deeds I imagine that he would be occupying the seat and I would be out of it.

On pages 74 and 75, of the hearings, is the following, very interesting colloquy between Mr. CRAIL, of the committee, and Mr. BECK. It shows that at the 1926 primary, when Mr. VARE was nominated, Mr. BECK contemplated the possibility of going to Congress and therefore rented the apartment in the first congressional district, shortly thereafter, in order that he might be the legatee to Mr. VARE'S seat.

Mr. CRAIL. At the primary of 1926, did you contemplate in your mind somewhat the possibility of running for Congress from the first district of Pennsylvania?

Mr. BECK. I contemplated the possibility of it. That is undoubtedly true. I had no assurance at that time of any support, and it is needless for me to say that it was not a question of entering the primary. It was a question of getting the support of the organization leaders. I had nothing to do with the primary in that year. As I said before, I was in Europe. I took no part in the primaries. I did not feel I had reestablished my citizenship sufficiently to take any part in them.

Mr. CRAIL. Mr. Hazlett was the candidate at that time, was he not?

Mr. BECK. Yes.

Mr. CRAIL. At that time was he holding the office of recorder?

Mr. BECK. I think he was.

Mr. CRAIL. He was holding the two offices for a while?

Sergeant at Arms ROGERS. Yes.

The Bailey case and all the precedents which follow it hold that an inhabitant in the constitutional sense must be one who is an habitual resident, completely identified with the State from which he comes, entitled to all the rights and privileges of the State, and subject to all its duties and responsibilities, and yet Mr. BECK was fraudulently placed upon the registry assessor's books on May 3, 1926. He did not take trouble to render himself liable to taxation; he paid no taxes for 1926 and none for 1927, and in 1927 found in his mail an assessment blank directed to him, stating that if he made no returns for 1928 he would be arbitrarily assessed by the taxing authorities. He did pay 25 cents for a poll-tax receipt in September, 1927, but we have the interesting spectacle of him who has written volumes upon civic duty and in defense of the American Constitution attempting to say to the House of Representatives that he was subject to the civic duties and responsibilities, as an inhabitant of the State of Pennsylvania, when he utterly ignored and neglected the taxing power of the State, without the taxes of which the State would fall into dissolution. If he were a bona fide resident or inhabitant, he would have gone to the taxing authorities. He would have caused himself to be assessed for 1926, which is the year he says he began his residence there. He would have become assessed or paid taxes for 1927, because his testimony shows that he had a financial agent in Philadelphia who for 10 years had handled his personal business, and that he had at all times taxable securities in Philadelphia. On December 31, 1927, after his election to Congress, Mr. BECK was arbitrarily assessed by the taxing authorities for $20,000. Mr. BECK filed no returns, although return sheets were presented to him. He stated that he chose to permit the arbitrary assessment to stand. He does not even say that it was too high or too low; then, if it was too low, as a good citizen it was his duty to make an honest return to the city of which he was an inhabitant, the city of his birth, in which he sought to represent a large constituency in the halls of the most important legislative body in the civilized world. (See pp. 66–67.)

In the Bailey case Mr. Hall, of North Carolina, might be heard saying in this House about Mr. BECK as he said about Mr. Bailey:

> A person must live among those who are to become his constituents. * * * He is confronting the abstract political right of citizenship with the act of inhabitancy which the Constitution requires. * * * I know no better definition of "inhabitance" than habitual residence.

Mr. BECK continued to file his income-tax statements, and still does so, from the District of Columbia, although it is made out by an agent in Philadelphia. (See p. 72.) There is no significance in the fact that he has a bank account in Philadelphia, because he has had one there for 10 years and also has accounts in New York, Washington, London, Paris, and Geneva. These are incidents showing the intent of Mr. BECK in connection with his failure to exhibit any intent he may have had to become a bona fide inhabitant of Philadelphia. Another indication is the fact that he continued as a nonresident member of the two clubs in Philadelphia of which he was a member. He did not change his status in the Art Club until the matter was called to his attention (see p. 70):

> Mr. BECK. A couple of months ago. But I was utterly unaware that I was a nonresident member of the Art Club. I paid no attention to it. I paid the dues and that was all I know.
> Mr. KENT. Was it at the time of your election that you learned that you were a nonresident member?
>
> Mr. BECK. I think it was about that time that some member of the club, attracted by the discussion—I imagine that it was shortly after the election, and there was some little discussion, and some member said to me, "Are you a resident or a nonresident member of the Art Club?" And I found I was a nonresident member, and I told them to transfer me to resident membership, which they did.
>
> Mr. KENT. And when was the transfer made?
>
> Mr. BECK. I have no recollection, except that it was a short time after that.
>
> Mr. KENT. But it was after the election.
> Mr. BECK. It was after the election.

In Washington, D. C., he has continued his membership as a resident member. With the desire to reidentify himself with his native city, it would seem that he would have been meticuously careful about his club membership, just as careful about establishing his family in Philadelphia, and still more careful about rendering proper tax returns to his city, his county, and his State, rather than "permit himself to be assessed whether the amount was just or unjust." In this case Mr. BECK stands before the highest tribunal on this subject which can adjudicate his title to this public office, and he must be treated in the same way as any other citizen. There is only one conclusion to be drawn from this conduct, namely, Mr. BECK did not regard himself as a bona fide inhabitant of Pennsylvania, or he would have rendered proper tax returns. His failure to do so and his acceptance of the arbitrary assessments lead one irresistibly to believe that the assessment was too low and not too high. It could not have been accurate because it was an arbitrary guess.

On the subject of assessments it is further interesting to note the manner in which Mr. BECK permitted himself to be carried upon the books of the registry assessor in the city of Philadelphia. We must bear in mind that Mr. BECK contends that the apartment was the habitation of himself and his wife and yet, after he was fraudulently placed upon the assessor's list in May of 1926, there were three separate assessments. In September, 1926, the name of Mr. BECK only appears—that was the assessment of May 3, 1926, concluded in September; Mrs. Beck's name does not appear. Mr. BECK's name appears at the end of the column in different ink and apparently in different handwriting from the names preceding it. In December of 1926 the name of Helen Beck appears, that being Mr. BECK's sister, and again Mr. BECK's name apppears at the end of the column. In the following assessment the name of Helen Beck has dropped out. Mr. BECK's name appears twice and Mrs. Beck's name appears for the first time. In the following assessment of December, 1927, the name of Mr. BECK only appears. The assessor placed upon the said report that they had gained their information from the janitor and superintendent of the building and in one instance by copying the names as they appeared on a directory on the first floor of the building. Mrs. Beck has never paid any taxes, was not assessed for real or personal property taxes, and never voted. This same condition existed so far as Helen Beck is concerned. Here, again, we have a condition wherein Mr. BECK failed to subject himself to the duties and liabilities of citizenship in Pennsylvania. That testimony shows lack of complete identification in Pennsylvania and its interests.

In order further to show that Mr. BECK had no intent to establish a habitation but a mere voting residence we quote from page 45, showing that he campaigned very little and was glad to get back to Washington. The intent is herein shown in that Mr. BECK was glad to get back home to his family, his habitation, books, and the things that he held dear. On page 45 of the hearings it is shown that he went out to dinner on the night of the election. Page 48 of the hearings shows that he did not even know the names of the gentlemen who nominated him. On pages 48 and 49 is told the remarkable story of Mr. BECK having heard from Senator VARE'S secretary that he was to be nominated for Congress waited alone in this apartment, was later told to come to a said meeting room and there he met a committee which he did not then know and does not now know, which committee nominated him for Congress. He does not know the location of that place or the voting place where the voting booth is. This is all perfectly conclusive—that Mr. BECK's sole intent and inclination was to establish a voting residence to comply with the legal qualifications necessary for voting and he never intended to become an inhabitant of Pennsylvania. In this connection it is of extreme importance to again note that establishing a home and becoming an inhabitant are quite different from reidentifying one's self with his native city.

We have thus gone to considerable length to prove that Mr. BECK was not completely identified with Pennsylvania when elected nor was he an habitual resident at that time entitled to all the rights and privileges of inhabitancy and subject to all the duties and obligations arising therefrom, nor did he have an habitual abode or domicile in that city.

If there had been any doubt that Mr. BECK was not a qualified voter of Philadelphia, it certainly ought to be set at rest after referring to the decisions cited and the argument made by the Hon. Alexander Simpson, jr., a justice of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania. (See vol. 69, No. 1, University of Pennsylvania Law Review, beginning on p. 1.)

If Mr. BECK was not such a resident of Pennsylvania under its particular election laws that he could become a qualified voter, then, under all conditions, he certainly was not an inhabitant of Pennsylvania. Having in mind that inhabitant is a stronger word than resident and requires not only locality of existence but permanency and habitual residence, we must know that an inhabitant of Pennsylvania clearly would be entitled to vote in that State by going through the technical process of assessment and registration. No one who reads Justice Simpson's article could possibly believe thereafter that Mr. BECK was an inhabitant of Pennsylvania. And we quote only a few of the paragraphs therefrom, in the hope that the committee will read carefully all the decisions cited thereunder. Beginning at page 4 of that volume may we quote as follows:

The question under consideration divides itself into two others, viz: (1) What does the word "resided" mean in the foregoing constitutional provisions and (2) under what circumstances may an elector choose which of two or more places shall be his voting residence? These questions naturally and inevitably run into one another, rendering it difficult to consider one without, in a large degree, considering the other; but an endeavor will be made herein to answer them separately, as far as it is possible so to do.

As the maxim expressio unius est exclusio alterius is applicable to the Constitution, and has been expressly applied to this part thereof (Page v. Allen, 58 Pa. 338 (1868)), it follows that, save in the excepted cases, a voter must have his actual residence in a particular election division of the State, in order to qualify him to vote there; and no expedient or excuse will avail him if he has not. Since the Constitution contains nothing antagonistic to this conclusion, it alone should solve the question in issue.

It is obvious, therefore, that even a technical construction of the constitutional provisions compel the conclusion that, save in the excepted cases, the voter must have an actual, fixed residence, in fact, in the place where he offers to vote; and that no other character of occupancy will suffice. Moreover, under the first of the foregoing principles of interpretation the Constitution is not to be technically construed, but as the average voter probably understood it. Every such man would unhesitatingly say that, in order to "have resided in the election district where he shall offer to vote at least two months immediately preceding the election," the voter must have actually lived there; it must have been his home as we know and love that term; not an imaginary or technical home, but an actual, established one; one which every unbiased citizen and neighbor would unhesitatingly say is the voter's home.

Fry's election case, herein repeatedly referred to, is the leading case in Pennsylvania upon the question as to whether or not students temporarily living in college, solely for the purpose of pursuing their studies are entitled to vote in the election district in which the college is situated, if they have complied with the other constitutional requirements in regard to suffrage. It was held they were not, for the reason that the word "resided" refers to a real home and not to a mere temporary stopping place; and this is substantially the unanimous American view.

See also Jacobs on the Law of Domicile, section 325:

I apprehend that if a citizen of the United States, formerly living in another State, abandons his residence there and moves into a house in Pennsylvania, which thereafter is his only home, and is occupied as such during the year prescribed by the Constitution, he would be entitled to vote here though he always intended to move away at some time in the future. Having given up his old home, there is no place to which the animus revertendi could apply; and the intention to move away from the new home at some time thereafter is at most a floating intention (Gilvert v. David, 235 U. S. 561 (1915); 19 Corpus Juris 407, 97, H. I. Cases, 124, 160 (1858)), which may float out of sight when the beauties of spring and fall lead him to feel he can not improve his condition by going elsewhere, but he may reappear with the chills of winter and the heat of summer.

And so it may well be said that in case one may be subject to a floating intention and Mr. BECK may have abandoned his intention to reside in the first congressional district of Pennsylvania, as the beauties of the Pennsylvania autumn and the exhilaration of a Pennsylvania election had passed away. He may have felt then that his law office and magnificent home in Washington, where his wife lived, and among his books, furnishings, and portraits would be a more acceptable place. Of course, under Mr. BECK's contention, his intention to inhabit Pennsylvania could again return with each succeeding election.

In this connection, it is important to note that in the event of Mr. BECK's death, there would be a question as to the particular taxing laws which would attach to the distribution of his estate. No matter where he may have voted or claimed the right to vote, yet his actual domicile would govern and it would appear quite conclusive that he would be taxed in accordance with the taxing laws of the District of Columbia. By a peculiar coincidence also under the law of Pennsylvania, Mr. BECK's property could not be attached in Pennsylvania under the attachment laws.

See also from Mr. Justice Simpson's opinion:

It is repeated, therefore, as a matter of law, that, subject to the exceptions specified in the Constitution, the residence prescribed by it must be an actual residence in the physical occupancy of the voter, his real home, in fact, and not in expression merely.

While it is doubtless true, as stated by Lord Cranworth in Whicker v. Hume, "By domicile we mean home, the permanent home," and if you do not understand your permanent home I am afraid that no illustration drawn from foreign writers or foreign languages will very much help you to it.

The rule stated in this latter case, namely, that the party's acts must accord with the choice he makes, applies even where there are two homes occupied at different seasons of the year; and a fortiori it does so where one thereof is but a perfunctory stopping place. In all such cases the statement that the voter has selected a certain place as his home must necessarily give way to proof of his acts; for one can not be heard to say, if in fact his actions show that some other place is his real home, "That actions speak louder than words is sound law as well as proverbial wisdom." (Graham v. Dempsey, 169 Pa. 460, 462 (1895).)

Therefore Justice Simpson has truly stated the law of Pennsylvania in a very few words to be as follows:

2. If he is a family man, the actual established home is ordinarily where the family actually lives. If not it is where he normally and usually resides; and no temporary use of any other house, whether or not he formerly lived there, will justify a choice by him, or avail as against the actual established home.

3. If he has two or more actual established homes, he may select which of them shall be his voting residence; but not otherwise.

4. He can not legally vote elsewhere than in the election district in which is situated his actual established home, as hereinbefore defined.

We have already pointed out by citations in the Bailey case what would be the result if officeholders in the District of Columbia were permitted, although being actually inhabitants there, to run for Congress and become elected in districts in the States of the Union. The Executive would thus have a powerful influence in shaping legislation and could eventually control Congress through the appointing power.

But there is a still greater evil which ought to be avoided. Congress, according to Champ Clark, will some day be almost in continuous session. The great, expanding, and varied interests of our people and the great population of our country have made it necessary, at least, to conduct one long session of Congress from December to June. Congressmen must, therefore, be understood to be in Washington temporarily, as temporary residents representing States in which they are inhabitants, but since Representatives must necessarily be in Washington for the temporary purpose of representing their people, a great danger would arise if they were permitted to have their chief occupation in Washington, as the actual practice of the law with Washington offices as headquarters for that practice. Mr. BECK has his office in the Southern Building. Twelve other lawyers, or persons engaged in business, have their offices in the same suite. These attorneys, according to official records of which this House in its judicial capacity will take judicial notice, appear before all the governmental bureaus and departments representing clients throughout the United States and foreign nations. No wrongdoing is imputed to Mr. BECK, but we can not conceive of conditions where, if Mr. BECK is permitted to retain his law practice in Washington and his established home here, and still be called an inhabitant of Pennsylvania, will other lawyers—as Members of Congress, not want to do the same thing?

If we establish this precedent, Members of Congress can practice law in Washington, own homes here, have their principal residence here, have law offices here, receive here fees for conducting the private business who employ associates of such Congressmen in matters affecting legislation on domestic and foreign affairs. Under article 198 of title 18 of the Criminal Code (see the Code of Laws of the United States of America, in force December 6, 1926, vol. 44 pt. 1, p. 474, and also under sections 202, 203, and 204 of the same volume and other penal laws) it would be unlawful for a Congressman to act in any matter against the United States or in which the United States was interested. In other words, a Representative could not be active in an individual capacity against his Government nor could he accept a fee nor be interested in compensation directly or indirectly growing out of any matter in which his Government was interested. It is doubtful whether he could even represent his Government in such matters. A Representative is wholly separated as a legislator from acting in any executive or judicial way, but if Congress should sink to a low ebb or level, can not we visualize a large proportion of a particular Congress made up of men of high intellectual attainments having offices in Washington, being secretly interested in matters affecting their Government, living in Washington, being inhabitants here, having permanent habitations here, controlled by persons and corporations whose sole interests would be to shape legislation in particular ways? Personally, I can see in the future probable conditions arising which would make such Congressmen the actual balance of power and the dominating influence in legislation. Such a condition would without doubt eventually bring about a dissolution of this powerful Government.

Other nations in the past have felt as secure of themselves as we now do. They were just as absolute. They felt that they had just as sure a grip on themselves as we feel that we now have. But they became careless. They allowed executive power to run on without restraint. They permitted the legislative authority to usurp functions that they did not possess and to-day they are no more than ashes and dust.

To seat Mr. BECK in this case would definitely set aside every leading precedent governing similar cases before the House of Representatives. We have quoted freely from the Bailey case, but another very important case is found in volume 1 of Hinds' Precedents, page 426, in the case of McDonald against Jones. At the same time of the election in 1894, and prior to and since that time, the contestant was engaged in business and resided with his family in the city of Washington in the District of Columbia. He had no place of business or residence of any description in the State of Virginia. It was held that he was not an inhabitant of the State of Virginia at or near the time of his election and was not eligible to his seat. That case is exactly like the present one, since Mr. BECK never claims to have been an inhabitant of Pennsylvania. But merely claims to have endeavored to reidentify himself with Pennsylvania in establishing a voting residence therein.

It is held in volume 1 of Hinds', page 381, in the case of William McCreery, that the States have no right or power to add to the qualifications of a Representative and so it became the sole and absolute duty of this House to decide this question according to the true intent and spirit of the Constitution.

Mr. VINCENT of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. KENT. I am happy to yield to the chairman of the committee.

Mr. VINCENT of Michigan. I want to correct the statement that the gentleman made. Mr. BECK was on the resident list of all the clubs he belonged to except only two clubs, and the resident list of the Metropolitan Club here in Washington includes people living anywhere within the United States.

Mr. KENT. The resident list of the Metropolitan Club in Washington consists of members who live within 30 miles of the city of Washington.

Mr. BROWNING. My recollection is that the only two clubs on which he was on the nonresident list were the ones he belonged to.

Mr. WELLER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KENT. I do.

Mr. WELLER. I do not see whether it makes any difference whether he was on the residential list or nonresidential list. If he maintained after he left Philadelphia his membership in the clubs of Philadelphia, it would indicate that he intended to go back there.

Mr. KENT. Perhaps; but the same conclusion would apply to clubs in London and to the Union League Club in New York, of which he was a member. Retaining his memberships there would indicate he intended returning to those places.

Mr. JACOBSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KENT. Yes.

Mr. JACOBSTEIN. Did the character of the district where the apartment he rented was located comport with the high position of Mr. BECK?

Mr. KENT. I had hoped that that point would not be brought up.

Mr. JACOBSTEIN. It concerns me as a question whether it was a subterfuge or not.

Mr. KENT. I had hoped that that would not be brought up. I was hoping that I myself, being a Representative from the State of Pennsylvania and a colleague of Mr. BECK's from the same State, would not be asked a question of that kind. But Mr. BECK, in my judgment, who has such a fine library and has so many art treasures and so beautiful a home in Washington, would not attempt to add to his already existing status—that is, the status of a citizen and inhabitant of the District of Columbia and a qualified voter under the statutes of New Jersey—by going into South Philadelphia, into this particular district, to live there. It does not seem probable.

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KENT. Certainly.

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. Is it not a fact that in October, 1927, the secretary or some other official of the Art Club of Philadelphia wrote to Mr. BECK and called his attention to the fact that Mr. BECK had been publicly identified as a resident of Philadelphia, and asked the question as to whether or not Mr. BECK did not desire his membership to be transferred from the nonresident roster to the resident roster?

Mr. KENT. That is partially right. Mr. BECK, when his attention was called to the fact that he was a candidate for Congress from Philadelphia and on the nonresident list of the club, suggested that he go on the resident list on the first of the next year.

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. And is it not further the fact that on November 7, 1926, before Mr. BECK was elected, he replied by letter that he desired to be transferred to the resident roster of that club?

Mr. KENT. I have answered that. But that does not affect the fact that he had no residence in Philadelphia. A man who is completely identified with the interests of Pennsylvania pays taxes therein, and from the time some one registered him on the registration books when he was in Europe, on May 3, 1926, until the hearings the testimony shows that he paid only 25 cents taxes, and no more. He was carried on the assessment lists in 1926 and 1927 and was adversely notified to make returns for personal-property taxes. He did not do so, but was arbitrarily assessed. But he paid no taxes except 25 cents up to the time of the hearings. [Applause.]

Mr. VINCENT of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DOUGLASS].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. DOUGLASS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, I do not desire to discuss the question at issue on such points as where a man sends his wash or how many books he has in his library or the clubs he belongs to. As the Democratic member of the committee who joined in the majority report, I have a brief outline of my ideas to give you.

This matter gave me great concern as a member of the committee. My position was not at all clear in the beginning of the hearings. In fact, I might say I was a bit prejudiced against the case of Mr. BECK. But as I listened to the evidence and as I heard the arguments advanced before the committee I was compelled to arrive at the conclusions of the majority.

I am first impressed by the debate in the Constitutional Convention itself. That debate as copied here in the report of the committee, taken from the Madison papers, occupies only a page in small type. However, the real argument was had upon the question of the word "inhabitant." What very brief statements were made I desire to take the time to read to you. In the first place, remember that the original draft of the Constitution contained the word "resident," and that word "resident" was afterward changed to "inhabitant," and the debates on the meaning of the words "inhabitant" and "resident" ensued.

Mr. Madison said, seconding the motion to have the word "inhabitant" inserted:

> Both were vague, but the latter least so in common acceptation, and would not exclude persons absent occasionally for a considerable time on public or private business. Great disputes had been raised in Virginia concerning the meaning of residence as a qualification of Representatives which were determined more according to the affection or dislike to the man in question than to any fixed interpretation of the word.

And from the day of the Constitutional Convention down to the present time, in all our courts there have been disputes and various interpretations of the words "resident" and "inhabitant." My judgment in this case has been formed because of the historical meaning of the word "inhabitant," as understood at the time of the framing of the Constitution, and at that time, as I gathered from my study of the question, the word "inhabitant" did not mean so much a resident as it meant a person who had a location in the colony, a person who was familiar with the local needs and conditions of the colony, and as I gather from the debate here and from the commentaries made upon it by historians, the meaning of the word "inhabitant," as used in our Constitution—and with the true meaning of that word we are engaged here to-day—is a person with a habitation in the community, one who is familiar with the local needs and conditions. So, when the Constitution provided that a man must be an inhabitant of the district from which he was elected, it meant that he should be a man who knew his people, who knew their interests, who knew their conditions, and who was one of them in the commonly accepted sense.

With that understanding of the word "inhabitant" I have gone down in my own mind to the case of JAMES M. BECK, and I find that Mr. BECK was born in the city of Philadelphia, the city from which he has had the honor to be elected. I find he was educated in the public schools of the city of Philadelphia and in the colleges of the great State of Pennsylvania. I find that his life, outside of his public service here in Washington in the service of the United States Government, his whole life, has been devoted to the interests of the city of Philadelphia and of the great State of Pennsylvania. His real interest was not in the clubs and in the social institutions alone but in the progress and in the development of his native city, so that when the Sesquicentennial Exposition was talked about and a true representative of that city was to be sent to Europe to interest foreign countries in that exposition, it was this JAMES M. BECK, of whom we are speaking, who was chosen by the mayor of Philadelphia to represent the people of Philadelphia, to represent the interests, the local interests and conditions of Philadelphia in the countries of Europe. [Applause.] And that man, a native of Philadelphia, a son of Pennsylvania, knowing that he was an inhabitant of the city of Philadelphia, desired to renew his connections with his native city, as was his right, and, I doubt not, he had an ambition to become a Member of Congress, as all of you men here had, otherwise you would not be here. With that honorable ambition to become a Member of this great legislative body and serve his Nation, as he had served his city, he comes to the city of Philadelphia and there builds a home, and under the Constitution and within the meaning of the word "inhabitant" he becomes a voter. I care not for the technicalities that have been raised here. He became a voter substantially and within the law. At the time he voted in the primaries of Philadelphia, in 1927, JAMES M. BECK was a bona fide, legal voter of the city of Philadelphia, a registered voter, and he was assessed and taxed as such. He had a right to vote for himself. No one disputes that, and if he had a right to vote for himself I can not see how the people of Pennsylvania, particularly the people of the city of Philadelphia, had not the right to vote for him for any office to which they wanted to elect him, and they did vote for him as a citizen and as an inhabitant of Philadelphia. They elected him to Congress by an overwhelming majority; they knew he was one of them; they knew that under the meaning of the debates in the Constitutional Convention JAMES M. BECK was familiar with local conditions; that he was able to represent them, and they elected him to represent them.

This case is simple, and I shall be brief. In conclusion, I say that under all the conditions he is entitled to a seat in this body. When the great State of Pennsylvania chose Mr. BECK to represent it in this House the people there believed he was their coinhabitant; they believed he was within his rights under the spirit and the letter of the American Constitution, and if they elected him with that understanding we can seat him with the same understanding. [Applause.]

Mr. VINCENT of Michigan. This closes the debate, Mr. Speaker, and we call for a vote.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the substitute offered by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BROWNING].

Mr. BROWNING. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. DOUGLASS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, may we have the resolution and the substitute again reported?

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the resolution and the substitute therefor.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the resolution and the substitute.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 78, nays 248, answered "present" 3, not voting 99, as follows:

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. VINCENT of Michigan, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted was laid on the table.

Mr. BECK of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to speak for five minutes. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. BECK of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker and my friends of the House of Representatives on both sides of the aisle, it seems strange that the first time I should crave the privilege of addressing the House of Representatives would be an occasion of this character; but when I entered the House and the right to my seat was questioned I determined then that until my right to sit in this House was cleared of any objection or question I would not take part in any debate, and I have consistently followed that principle.

But now I have at least the opportunity to thank the Members of the House—and I include those who voted "aye" as well as those who voted "no"—for the patience, care, and consideration with which they have heard a question of real difficulty and of profound constitutional importance.

It is idle to minimize the fact that the question is one of great importance in the future development of our political institutions. When I made my statement before the committee I made this statement which I venture to quote:

> This is my case, and if this committee and, later, the House of Representatives should place a narrower interpretation upon the Constitution I should accept the result without any resentment, for I not only recognize that the question is not free from difficulty, but I especially recognize that the distinguished Representative from Tennessee who assumed the responsibility of this challenge to my eligibility was actuated by no unworthy or partisan motive.

[Applause.]

That, gentlemen, was not a mere conciliatory gesture on my part. It was said because of my long knowledge and deep respect and esteem for the leader of the minority in this House, and I knew full well that for me personally he entertained none but the kindliest feeling, I knew full well that only convictions as to his interpretation of the Constitution led him as a matter of conscience to challenge my right to the seat at the beginning of the session. This was clearly within his rights. I did not resent it then and I do not resent it now.

There were certain things that happened during the committee meetings that I confess wounded me very deeply, but to show you how completely those wounds have long since healed, let me add that although I was besought in the recent campaign to go into the thirtieth Pennsylvania district, in which the gentleman from Pennsylvania, who made the final argument against me, was a candidate, and make some political addresses against his candidacy, and although it was a district in which my college is situated and in which I have many warm personal friends, I nevertheless declined to do anything that might seem to be actuated by any petty personal feeling of resentment or revenge. [Applause.]

And now, gentlemen, if you will pardon me, just a further word: I did seek an opportunity to represent the city of my birth in this House. I am not going to pose by suggesting that the seat was thrust upon me or that I, actuated by high purposes, simply yielded to irresistible pressure to run for office. [Laughter and applause.] I frankly sought it, and I sought the office because I had a very deep and abiding love for the city of my birth, which has never left me and will, I trust, last until my latest breath, and because I believed that with the little knowledge I have acquired in the judicial and executive branches of the Government I might be of some service to the city of Philadelphia in this House by being one of its Representatives. I may add that I had this further motive, that having been a student of our constitutional institutions for more than 30 years and having had some experience with the judicial and the executive branches of the Government, I thought I would like, as a matter of education, to serve in the House of Representatives and see the legislative department of the Government from the inside.

Well, I have had my education. [Laughter.] It has been long and laborious, but most educations that are worth anything are long and laborious; but it has had its compensation for me a thousandfold. When I first came into the House I confess that the apparent confusion which my superficial observations seemed to disclose, made me wonder why I had ever left the quiet decorum of the Supreme Court of the United States to come into so vociferous a body as the House of Representatives. I then found that my superficial views were erroneous and that the richest compensation for service in this House are the friendships that one makes on both sides of the aisle, and as the months passed these friendships made me covet ever more and more a wish to remain in this House; and in the vote that has just been passed I have had abiding proof of those friendships, and I want the gentlemen on the other side of the House, many of whom voted for me, to know how deeply I appreciate the fact that they rose above any question of party politics and ignored the fact that I was not of their political faith and voted to sustain my right to this seat.

I have already spoken more than I intended, and I will only say in the words of Hamlet—

> And what so poor a man as Hamlet is
> May do, to express his love and friending to you,

On both sides of the aisle—

> God willing, shall not lack.

[Applause.]
